Famed Torah scholar rues loss of Jewish life, but holds out hope

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz begins an interview, it is he who poses the first question.

"Tell me about who you are," he exhorts, settling down in a chair at the Ritz Carlton Hotel. His query is a definite sign that this won't be just another Q and A.

Rabbi Steinsaltz does not want to know what you do, but who you are, who you really are.

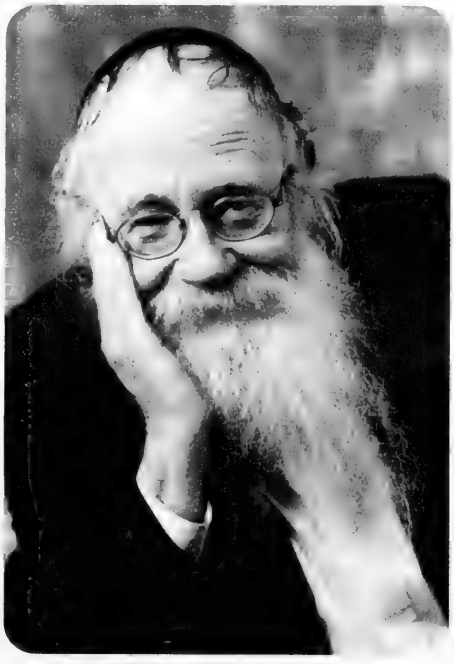
At age 69, he is a revered scholar and mystic who has won the Israel Prize, written more than 60 books, translated the Talmud into modern Hebrew, is resurrecting the Sanhedrin, and is sometimes likened to Rashi and Maimonides – a comparison he rejects.

"All nice words, but I am not in the same category by any means," he said before an informal talk he gave at Chabad Westmount and a day before delivering the Helen and Sam Steinberg Lecture at the Shaar Hashomayim Congregation.

Rabbi Steinsaltz's outward appearance is rabbinic: a full, white beard enveloping a bespectacled, sage visage.

Yet Rabbi Steinsaltz, 69, also sprinkled his replies with humour and references that betrayed his vast, sophisticated knowledge of the modern world. He made references to Voltaire, the late muckraking U.S. southern columnist Harry Golden, Maxim Gorki and others.

Rabbi Steinsaltz provided long, anecdotal answers to the limited number of questions that time allowed.



Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz

But the responses kept returning to the same theme: the need to revive the spark of Judaism within so many lost Jewish souls, "to make Jews more Jewish."

For him, being Jewish does not mean just donning tfillin or observing kashrut, which he described as "points of identity." He also stressed the need for Jews, whether "physicists or shoemakers," to do something significant in life, to make a difference.

Is it possible for a Jew to identify him or herself strongly as a "cultural," even atheistic Jew, and still be Jewish?

Rabbi Steinsaltz's reply was that such Jews are "transistant," in a sort of intermediary stage in which they "clearly have a connection and identification, but it is incomplete.

"Jewish culture is a very theocentric culture," he said. "If you take the centre out of it, it is a hollow shape. How long can a hollow shape stand?

"It is true there are people who fight against God, but they are not atheists. They are believers who have a quarrel with God.

"It's not just the matter of not going to synagogue or not eating kosher. Some people claim they're atheists, but their Jewish knowledge is at a kindergarten level. Jewish people have a notion of belief that is so ingrained that it has to be prodded out."

Rabbi Steinsaltz recalled meeting a Jew who told him how he purposely ate bacon and eggs on Shabbat.

"I asked him if he only did it on Shabbos. He did. So I said: 'You are, in your own way, keeping Shabbos and making the day special. But it's not my way of doing it.'"

He quoted Gorki: "There cannot be a Jewish atheist," because all Jews, even those who claim to be atheists, Rabbi Steinsaltz suggested, cannot renounce their innermost theocentric spark.

At the same time, "Jewish life is an endangered life," he said, lamenting the fact that Jews try to live vicariously through Israel without focusing enough on their personal Jewish identities being lost to intermarriage and assimilation.

Rabbi Steinsaltz cited the case of a remote town in the middle of Sweden where a girl who discovered her Jewish identity travelled several kilometres every week to study her religion.

"When I look at something like what a spark can do in a place where there are no other Jews. She had to, in a way, create it from nothing."

Rabbi Steinsaltz doesn't see himself as someone wielding enough influence to ignite those sparks. "I cannot make an outcry from Winnipeg to Vancouver. I am not here to make a big noise, but a noise that will penetrate," he said.

"A lot of people don't like my speeches," he said, because he sometimes draws an analogy between the gradual erosion of Jewish life with the suicides of "noble Romans," who immersed themselves in warm baths, cut their wrists and let life ebb out of them slowly, comfortably.

"This is what I feel is happening to Jews in so many places: a comfortable death, just draining out of you," he said.

Still, despite that dire scenario, Rabbi Steinsaltz sees the situation as "the worst of all possible worlds where there is hope."

Rabbi Steinsaltz is certain that there is a "nice Jewish Canadian committee" struggling with such issues, but he warned against the actions of "do-gooders" in the area of Jewish continuity who fail to see the long-term potential ramifications of what they do.

"If you want to be a do-gooder, fine," he said, "but are you willing to pay for it for the next 25 years?"

11-year-old 'Katyusha girl' visits Toronto

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Miriam Silverberg has a hobby that few kids outside of Israel can claim: she collects Katyusha shrapnel.

While Hezbollah was busy firing its rockets at the northern Israeli town of Kiryat Shmonah, the precocious 11-year-old and her 15-year-old brother, Yisroel, decided that collecting pieces of the exploded artillery in their neighbourhood would make a fun pastime while they waited out the war.

Her exploits garnered her much media attention.

Dubbed the "Katyusha Girl of Kiryat Shmonah" by National Post blogger Michael Newman and featured on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360, Silverberg achieved celebrity status in her hometown. But to her parents, Barry and Masha Silverberg, she was just their daughter and a girl trying to make the best out of a horrific situation.

"We didn't look for [Katyushas], we hunted them," Miriam said. "Every time we finished [hunting] and did good, my brother would say, 'That was a good hunt.'"

Masha, a child psychologist trained in stress and trauma counselling, was fearful of her children's "hunting expeditions" at first, but eventually she came to see the activity as beneficial to their mental health.

"It's not the loudness of the explosion, it's what the child or parent says to themselves about the event," said Masha, who believes that physically touching pieces of Katyushas and proactively seeking them out helped her children feel more in control of their circumstances.

"There were frightening times, moments of terror, but there were other times where we were laughing and doing things [together] and that helped," she said. "It was terribly important to keep busy and not focus on fear."

During the war, Masha, who works for the city of Kiryat Shmonah, spent her time counselling in shelters, while Barry, a masseur and teacher, helped doctors stay tension-free by providing massage therapy at local hospitals, and he also helped bring food and medical supplies to people who couldn't leave their homes.

For her part, Miriam enjoyed her newfound fame. Although she felt strange being constantly interviewed by reporters, it was fun because her family became popular, she said.

"I wish they made Katyushas without [the warhead], so we could have a full one and show it around."

Miriam and Masha made their first visit to Canada last week on a whirlwind vacation and speaking tour of Toronto Jewish community schools.

The Silverbergs brought along samples of Katyusha shrapnel, displaying them to local children and relating their experiences during the war with Hezbollah.

The trip, arranged by Newman "to help them forget the terror and fear they lived under for 33 days in July and August," as he wrote in his "Word From the Front Line" blog, gave them much-needed time away from Kiryat Shmonah, where pockmarked buildings continue to remind the family of the war.

The Silverbergs were billeted with a local family during their week-long stay from Oct. 19 to Oct 25.

"You have an amazing country," Masha said after a trip to Niagara Falls last Tuesday.

"It's so big. So much water and everyone's so polite," added Miriam.

Though both were anxious to go back home, they said it was a trip they would not soon forget.

"I will tell my friends about Niagara Falls. That's something you don't see every day," said a still wide-eyed Miriam. "It was all over the place… it's amazing."

"This respite was wonderful," said Miriam. "I have deep gratitude for the acts of kindness that we have been shown by the [Toronto Jewish] community. People have been very kind and generous. To witness and experience that kind of chesed, you learn from it and it deepens you."

Israel may have to invade border area: minister

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel will have no alternative but to invade the Philadelphi route, the strip of land between Egypt and Gaza, if Palestinian militants continue to use it to smuggle arms and ammunition, Israel's former deputy minister of defence warned last week.

"The Philadelpi route is an autostrada, a highway, for smugglers," Ze'ev Boim said in an interview. "Sophisticated weapons, including anti-tank missiles and anti-aircraft missiles, are being smuggled into Gaza from Egypt. If Egypt doesn't monitor the border seriously, we'll have no choice but to invade the Philadelphi route."

With Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in the summer of 2005, Egypt assumed responsibility for maintaining security in the narrow corridor known as the Philadelphi route. Until then, it was controlled by the Israeli army.

Since Israel's pullout, Palestinians have been smuggling a deadly array of military equipment through a web of tunnels across the Philadelphi route

But since Israel's pullout, Palestinians have been smuggling a deadly array of military equipment through a web of tunnels across the Philadelphi route, arousing indignation and fear in Israel.

Boim, a former armoured corps company commander and currently Israel's minister of absorption, also warned that Israel will have to adopt "very tough" military measures to stop Palestinians in Gaza from firing Qassam rockets at Israeli border towns.

These measures would include the destruction of buildings used as launch sites, arms storage areas and Qassam manufacturing facilities, he explained.

Boim ruled out the re-occupation of Gaza as a viable option.

"It would be a bad idea. We were there and still, we have to admit, we couldn't totally put an end to the Qassams. It would be of no use to be inside Gaza to deal with that problem."

Boim, a member of the Kadima party who bolted from the Likud, called on the Palestinians to decide whether they want to coexist with Israel.

He described Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, as Israel's potential partner in forging a peace agreement.

"But Abbas is weak and can't deliver the goods. He hasn't taken tough measures to combat terrorism, but he has to take risks."

Charging that Hezbollah and Iranian agents have infiltrated Gaza, Boim called this a "very dangerous development."

As well, he noted somberly, Palestinian militants now regard Hezbollah as a model to be emulated in terms of tactics and strategy.

Turning to the recent war in Lebanon, Boim said that Israel achieved a lot.

"We seriously damaged Hezbollah's military capabilities, though we didn't knock them out. We destroyed 75 per cent of their long-range rockets and all their bases and communication centres. We also killed 700 of their fighters. We have all the names."

But he acknowledged that Hezbollah still exists and that its secretary-general, Hassan Nasrallah, has attained heroic status in Lebanon and throughout the Arab and Muslim worlds.

Asked whether he expects a renewal of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, Boim said, "It depends on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and the Lebanese government."

Boim said that if United Nations Resolution 1701 is fully implemented and Hezbollah is no longer regarded as a major military threat in southern Lebanon, there will be no need for another round of warfare.

In his view, Iran's nuclear ambitions and its radical Islamic ideology pose a threat not only to Israel but to the entire world.

"The right way to deal with Iran is for the international community to take action, though diplomatic activity hasn't helped so far. It will be a disaster for non-proliferation if Iran acquires an atomic arsenal."

Boim said that Israel should not resume bilateral peace talks with Syria under current conditions.

"Why should we talk now? Syria played a role in the arming of Hezbollah and still hosts Hamas and Islamic Jihad. So why should we talk?"

But the Israeli government should reopen talks with Syria once its president, Bashar Assad, takes practical, confidence-building steps to assure Israel that he is serious about peace.

Toronto poet pays homage to Russian master

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Like many cultural festivals, Toronto's Jewish Book Fair usually offers high-profile "bookend" events to open and close its program, which runs this year from Nov. 4 to 12.

The closing event features Toronto poet Rafi Aaron, whose few published volumes have travelled surprisingly far and gained impressive renown in the world.

On Nov. 12, Aaron and friends are due to present a celebration in words and music of the life and poetry of Osip Mandelstam, the legendary Russian-Jewish poet who died in a Stalin-era labour camp in 1938.

Mandelstam is the subject of Aaron's latest collection of poems, Surviving the Censor: The Unspoken Words of Osip Mandelstam. Although Seraphim Editions only recently brought out the 86-page volume, its contents have already won renewed critical attention for Aaron, since some of the poems were previously published in journals and were shortlisted for national magazine awards.

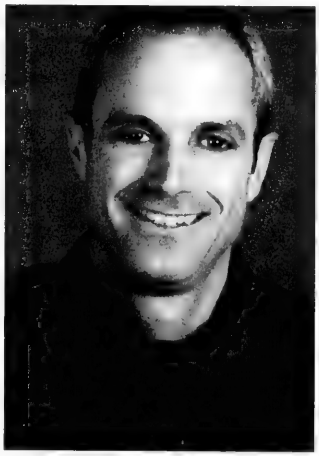
Two years ago, the Canadian foreign ministry invited Aaron to speak about Mandelstam in St. Petersburg, Russia, an adventure he calls "the trip of a lifetime."

Aaron took eight or nine years to complete the collection of 48 prose poems, through which he sought "to pay homage to a master." The poems were written in four voices: of the poet, his wife, a researcher, and a fellow inmate of the camp in which Mandelstam died.

"I set out to tell Mandelstam's story in art," Aaron explained. (He is now writing a play on the same subject.)

For Aaron, a large part of the creative process involved reading many volumes of Russian literature, memoirs and history. "As soon as I learned the facts, I tried to forget them, because I'm trying to convey the spirit of the times – to squeeze the facts to get the juice."

After being arrested in 1934 for a poem attacking Stalin, Mandelstam endured 4½ years of persecution and internal exile before his death at 43. His wife, Nadezhda, and others so revered his state-forbidden writings that they committed many of his poems, fiction, literary criticism and even newspaper articles to memory.



Rafi Aaron

Aaron, born in Ottawa in 1959, said he was "totally blown away" the first time he read Mandelstam's poetry, which "was unlike anything I'd ever read."

"The effect it had on me as a reader was amazing. It's so filled with literary references, it's actually an education just reading one of his poems and trying to come to the end, because there are so many tangents."

After completing courses in Judaic studies at York University, Aaron lived in Israel for nine years and held a senior position with a prominent advertising and public relations firm. His colleagues were astounded when he announced he was leaving the company to write a book.

That first poetry volume, published in 1990 under the title The Lost and Found, won the Tel Aviv Foundation prize in Israel, among other awards, and prompted PEN Israel to arrange a reading tour for Aaron to the United States.

His next book was the coffee-table volume A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood (1998), which was republished by Syracuse University Press in 2000. The book, which combined poetry and photographs, became a travelling exhibit seen by many thousands of people in Canada, the United States and Israel.

At Toronto's Jewish Book Fair, Aaron teams up with actors Dmitry Chepovetsky and Shauna MacDonald (who will read in Russian), and musicians Daniel and Carey Domb, to present A Celebration in Reading and Music of the Life and Poetry of Osip Mandelstam.

The event takes place at Leah Posluns Theatre on Nov. 12 at 8 p.m. It costs $5. For tickets, call 416-636-1880, ext. 368.

The Holocaust and what it means to remember

By JORDAN PELC
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

As part of the third generation since the Holocaust, I have grown up with the memory of the Shoah – to the extent that memory can be bestowed on those who were not there to remember – as a constant premise in my life.

Jewish school, my friends' grandparents, family trees, novels I read as a child – the theme of the Holocaust could be found in all these things, and, so far as one can bear witness to what one has not witnessed, I carry its warning with me.

And so as I look to the broader world and see its diminishing memory of the horror, and as the general public displays everything from ignorance to historical confusion to outright denial, it's very difficult to understand this incredible capacity to forget.

From Sinai to pogroms to Nazi Germany, Jews remember. That's what it is to be a Jew.

But then I must ask if we, too, have forgotten, or if there is much that we never knew to remember.

Can we honestly say that we remember the killing fields of Cambodia, where millions were tortured and slaughtered, and do we remember its horrors as we want the world to remember ours?

Do we remember Rwanda, where the United Nations withdrew to watch a million people be killed in 100 days? Do we remember Bengal, Kurdistan, or all the others?

What about Darfur, which is easy to remember, because its horror is still going on, and where even at this moment, new killings are being added to the thousands before them?

All of these genocides have occurred since we promised that the horror of the Holocaust meant "never again." All of these genocides happened despite six million Jewish warnings, al kiddush HaShem.

And so I must ask, what purpose is there in remembering? How does it help? There is, of course, value in remembrance itself, for at the very least, victims' lives can be honoured in death. But that's not the danger that I was always told lay in forgetting. That's not "never again." That's not why we've been fighting for 60 years to never forget.

To remember is to prevent. What else could it mean?

If we are to remember the Holocaust so that we never let it happen again, every unstopped genocide means ours was in vain, and every new death is a mockery of the memory of those who died before.

So let's admit to ourselves that we are failing. Let's not be too proud to see that danger. And let's not be too proud to wonder why.

In 10 years of Jewish day school, not once did I hear a word about any other genocide. Not once did I hear about Rwanda, which happened when I was in Grade 4, learning about the Holocaust. Not once was I taught that I could act, that I could help. Not once was I told enough to know that we were not doing enough.

There are no simple answers, and no meaning behind grand statements of "never again" when they are drained of detail and context. There is, rather, a deep and nuanced history of genocide, of "again and again," and also of hot air, UN resolutions, impotent attempts, failed states and failed interventions.

The burden of remembering is the burden of learning all of this, and of understanding that we have the power to fight new holocausts.

For this reason, students at the University of Toronto, York University, and Ryerson University have organized Holocaust and Genocide Awareness Week, which runs until Nov. 9 and brings together films, speakers, survivors and more in order to link our horror to that of others, and to be part of the great effort to remember – to truly remember.

So I challenge you to take this chance to learn what you can, and to begin to figure out what you can do.

Yes, there were and are loud Jewish voices who have fought against past and current genocides, and of course we should be proud of this and not forget that we have tried. And no, we can't expect that it's within our power to stop things that we may simply not be able to stop.

But until we can say collectively that we are exhausted and spent, until we can say with honesty that there was nothing else we could have done, every genocide is an accusation from history that we have allowed ourselves to forget.

Hitler said that "no one remembers the Armenians," and we have grown to not even know who else we don't remember. It has happened again, and it's happening now – and we don't remember. But we must. That's what it means to be a Jew.

'The Torah says we cannot stand idly by when anyone is being harmed'

Rabbi Whitman said this attempt to publicly shame Binson into releasing his wife is entirely acceptable under Jewish law and is not meddling in a private matter.

"If a man is hurting a woman, every moral person must try to intercede to help her… The Torah says we cannot stand idly by when anyone is being harmed."

The demonstration was also intended to send the message that the get cannot be used as leverage in divorce settlements or as a weapon of revenge, he said

Rabbi Steinmetz was even blunter. "The community has to learn that you can't mistreat people under the guise of religion. This is abuse of Jewish law, a crime in Judaism. He is using Judaism to extort and hurt people. He is beating his wife with the Bible. Anyone with any connection to Judaism should be appalled."

The rabbis said similar action may be taken against other offenders. They are aware of three or four other cases of long-term get refusal in Montreal.

"We are going to go after the person and the enabler and make them very uncomfortable," Rabbi Steinmetz warned.

The Rabbinical Council declared it a mitzvah for anyone who is able to persuade Binson to agree to give a get to free his ex-wife of being an agunah.

The very rare measure of 100 rabbis declaring that a marriage is over without the man's agreement could not likely be used in a case like this, Rabbi Whitman said. The opinion of most rabbinical authorities is that this tool can only be used when, for example, the man is in a persistent vegetative state.

Rabbi Whitman, a native of New Haven, Conn., who has been in Montreal for five years, says he has never heard of a demonstration like this, but he said early on in his career he pledged to use whatever pressure he can to help agunot.

Rabbi Steinmetz agreed that a review of Jewish divorce is needed, but measures like this may have to be used in the short term.

Evelyn Brook, head of the coalition for the get, applauded such action, as long as it has the ex-wife's approval. "Pearl Binson is a brave woman," she said.

Also present was Rabbi Moishe New, head of Lubavitch's Montreal Torah Centre, and Saul Deitcher, chair of the Vaad Ha'ir board.

Memory of Primrose Club honoured at U of T

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's been almost 50 years since the University of Toronto expropriated the building that housed the Primrose Club, an elite Jewish men's club, but last week a plaque was donated to honour the directors of the club and acknowledge the building's history.

In 1959, the building at 41 Willcocks St. was expropriated by U of T and turned into the university's Faculty Club.

"Since 1960, we, the Faculty Club have used that building, but we know that it was originally that of the Primrose Club," said Richard Stren, outgoing president of the Faculty Club and emeritus professor of political science at U of T.

He said that the Jewish men's society was originally founded in 1907 as the Cosmopolitan Club and was incorporated as the Primrose Club in 1919. Two years later, the club bought the building now known as the Faculty Club.

Stren said that the Oct. 25 ceremony came about as a result of a request by Estelle Creed Kaufman, daughter of the late Edmond Creed, who was the last president of the Primrose Club before its building was expropriated by the university.

Kaufman asked the Faculty Club if it would allow her to donate a plaque in honour of her parents, Edmond and Rae Creed, and of the club's founders.

"When she phoned, I thought this would be an interesting opportunity to revisit the history of this building and the history of downtown Toronto," Stren said.

The Primrose Club, which Stren described as a place where men gathered to play cards, eat and socialize, moved to another location on St. Clair Ave. W. between Avenue and Spadina roads, but that property, too, was eventually sold to developers and the club no longer exists.

Marvin Sazant, Creed's nephew and a member of the Faculty Club, unveiled the plaque donated by his cousin, Kaufman, who could not attend the ceremony because she lives in Michigan.

"The Faculty Club is very lucky to have been able to inherit this building. We think it is a wonderful, beautiful property. In fact, we consider it a luxury, one of the most gracious and elegant buildings we have on campus," he said, adding that the Faculty Club at U of T has 2,300 members and is the largest university faculty club in Canada.

Doctor pedals for Jerusalem kids' hospital

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Dr. Ellen Warner knows what it means to face challenges and hold out hope.

The Toronto oncologist has diagnosed, treated and counselled women with breast cancer for almost 20 years. Facing the disease and its victims on a daily basis at the Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre, where she has worked for the past 13 years, takes courage.

So when Warner saw a window of opportunity in her calendar to participate in this year's Wheels of Love international bike marathon in Israel, she signed up immediately to help raise money for some courageous Israeli children.

The marathon, Israel's biggest athletic charity event, benefits Jerusalem's Alyn Hospital, the country's only non-denominational pediatric and adolescent rehabilitation centre. It treats children who have been physically disabled through acts of war, terrorism and natural causes.

Now in its seventh year, the five-day, 483-kilometre event attracts hundreds of participants from around the world and is a crucial one for the non-profit organization.

Alyn receives no government funding and public health insurance only covers up to 70 per cent of patient care. The hospital relies on private sponsors and donations to recoup a yearly funding shortfall of close to $3 million (US).

Warner first heard about Alyn while living in Israel in the early 1980s. The hospital was located around the corner from her home, but she remained unaware of its mission.

"I had no idea what it was," she said.

"But one day my mom came to visit… took one of my kids for a stroll and went by to find out what it was all about. We became so excited about it, that for two of [my] sons' bar mitzvahs, we took Alyn on as our pet project and made donations to them."

Alyn has not been far from her thoughts since.

"A few years ago, a friend in Israel sent me a letter asking me to donate to the Wheels of Love ride. I gave money and I said to myself, 'This looks really cool. I'd love to do that.' I looked at my calendar and thought, 'Some day I'll do it.' And this is the year," she said.

The course takes participants through scenic landscapes, but it's not for the faint of heart. Riders bike more than 480 kilometres to Eilat from Jerusalem over five days. Warner left for Israel last Thursday to be ready for this year's race, which ran from Oct. 29 to Nov. 2.

Warner, who described herself as a "chronic recreational cyclist," bikes to and from work daily. Though well aware that she would not be the fittest participant in the event, Warner knew she would not let Alyn's children down.

"Once I've set a goal, I do it," she said. "I will complete it if it kills me. But I may be the last one."

Participants such as Warner play an integral part in raising Alyn's profile. It's one of the major reasons she's going this year.

"I hate publicity, but if this is going to do good for Alyn, then this is my way of compensating for not being as diligent in fundraising," she said.

To her knowledge, she raised more than $2,500 prior to the event, but she anticipated that some much larger donations would be made in her name before she left.

In an e-mail interview, Eric Kaminsky, Alyn's Canadian liaison, praised Warner's commitment. "We know Dr. Warner is an extremely busy person whose work is depended upon by many people," he said. "So we are pleased that she has chosen our cause as her time away from her busy schedule."

For Warner, it was a decision she was happy to make. She viewed the marathon as an opportunity to recharge mentally and emotionally from her demanding work schedule while contributing to a good cause.

"Part of being a doctor is also having a life, too. People who can't do that are in trouble," she said. "Being able to mesh helping these kids, my love for Israel, the beauty of riding through Israel, and my love of cycling… is a unique, amazing experience."

For more information about Alyn, visit www.alyn.org.

PINE VILLA JAZZ CAFE: Community members and residents of Pine Villa Retirement Residence turned out recently for the residence's jazz cafe. The sun may still be shining, but don't get fooled – winter is on its way, and it sure can take a toll on your skin. Make sure to cleanse well and exfoliate only where the skin is oily and then apply a heavy moisturizer.

Since the cold wind can irritate your eyes, it's best to use a waterproof mascara, and don't forget your lips! During the winter we have the tendency of licking our lips, which dries them even more. Apply a hydrating lip balm and stay away from matte lipsticks.

This winter the look is understated. Smoky shades of coffee and chocolate are the colours for eyes. Berry, pink, red, honey and coppers are the hot palettes for blush and lips. It's time to get into the holiday spirit and think about your holiday look!

Maurice Fiorio tells us that for this season, the primary focus is to recondition the hair from the summer. Have your stylist perform a deep-conditioning treatment on your hair to restore the moisture and lustre lost from the summer heat. While at home, try once a week to deep-condition your hair using a moisture/protein-based shampoo and conditioner like Fiorio Revie (shampoo) and Restore (conditioner).

Darker hair shades are predominant. At this time of year, it is better to add pigment to the hair instead of highlighting, which removes pigment. Avoid over-processing the hair through highlighting. Lowlights are be a better alternative. Relaxing and perming are also taxing on hair at this time; however, treating it will help relieve the dryness and keep hair shiny and healthy.

Long hair is always in style, but bringing it up through layers to create soft waves, with a voluminous fuller look, is a trend. And as the festive season approaches – the time for classic, feminine tresses – updos will become dominant.

Redken has reinvented styling and aligned its products on three key pillars – fashion, science and inspiration. The result is sleek new packaging and innovative formulas that can be blended or layered to help customize styles to best suit the individual. Redken has launched two new styling products: Ringlet 07 Curl Perfector, a one-of-a-kind formula for curly hair. This lightweight curl perfecting cream-gel activates, defines and controls curls and waves with weightless, anti-frizz medium control, making hair soft, manageable and touchable. Electric Wax 11 Shine Fused Texturizer, a multi-benefit product, combines shine-shocking texture with medium control. Made of a unique pliable wax formula, it creates deconstructed definition with bold, chunky forms that are infused with luminous flecks for dimensional shine.

Hair: Sleek, sophisticated styles are captured by Goody Products, Inc. in the new Park Avenue Collection, an elegant hair accessory line inspired by the world's most stylish women. The collection features velvet headbands, pearl-adorned bobby slides, faux-crocodile claw clips, flower ponypins and enamelled flower ponytail holders in many palettes, including lush golds, brilliant browns, regal purples, milky creams and dramatic blacks.

Ouchless brushes are synonymous with comfortable, effortless styling. Goody has extended the unique Ouchless Collection to include round and paddle brushes, combs, bobby pins and elastics that have the same emphasis on easy, snagless styling. Don't miss it!

Goody Products Inc. has solved the equation for healthy, shiny hair with StylingSolutions, a complete collection of solution-based styling tools that will help you create a look and style that is uniquely you. For anti-frizz protection, a shorter drying time and a sleek polished look, try the So Hot Collection; for gentle tools for your sensitive hair and scalp, less damage and breakage and static-free styling, try the So Natural Collection; and for low-maintenance styling, static-resistant hair and value, try the So Smart Collection.

STACEY'S SPA AND SKIN-CARE TIPS

Lancôme presents Absolue Premium Bx with Pro-xylane, a new high-performance, innovative anti-aging active ingredient with excellent facial-skin rejuvenating benefits, which acts to redensify and restructure the fundamental matrix that irrigates the skin's three components. The Absolue Premium Bx formulas offer women aged 50 and over a complete skin-care range, with visible and long-lasting results. Included are Advanced Replenishing Cream and Fluid each with SPF 15, Advanced Replenishing Eye Cream and Advanced Night Recovery Cream.

Introducing Dermaglow Nuvage Anti-Aging Eye Therapy, which contains a revolutionary ingredient complex called Idebezone that works to repair skin damaged by environmental stresses. It restores the appearance of youthful vitality by minimizing fine lines and wrinkles, and reduces the appearance of under-eye bags and dark circles. In addition, don't miss Dermaglow Nuvectin Advanced Foaming Cleanser, a gentle and effective foaming face wash that cleanses smoothes and moisturizes, leaving skin supple and radiant.

For a more intense anti-aging boost to the skin, Clinique introduces the Dream Team – the Repairwear Retreat gift set that includes: Repairwear Deep Wrinkle Concentrate for Face and Eyes, which will jumpstart natural collagen production; Repairwear Day SPF 15 Intensive Day, which blocks out harmful UV rays while helping to repair fine lines and wrinkles; and Repairwear Intensive Night Cream, which works all night to help diminish fine lines and wrinkles. Don't miss it!

Softer shades of pink are used for blush, and shimmer on the cheekbones is hot! Chanel introduces Irréelle Blush a silky cheek colour in gold to add that special glow.

Once you have moisturized your lips, Cargo's Holiday 2006 Collection Daily Gloss is a 30-day supply of lip gloss packaged in individual tear-away pouches. Each sealed application is filled with CARGO's signature, unbeatable lip gloss formulation that provides sheer, long-wearing colour without stickiness.

Chanel's Exclusive Holiday Collection Christmas 2006 introduces Levrès Multifacettes De Chanel, a checkerboard lipstick palette made up of harmonies of pink, apricot, nude, lilac and red. Try it and take part in a game of creation!

If you are looking for the two in one, Rimmel Infinite Colour Lights Double-Ended Lip Colour is designed with one end of the tube being a quick-drying, moisturizing high impact liquid colour. At the other end is a shiny topcoat gloss that will stay put for up to 10 hours.

Now that your canvas is done, make sure to give yourself that final touch. Shimmer Powder by Elizabeth Arden completes the look while giving the skin a luminous glow and comes with a soft brush for easy application. Apply to cheekbones, neck and shoulders.

Before you get dressed and head out for that holiday party, remember to put on your favourite fragrance. The new Pleasures by Gwyneth Paltrow Eau de Parfum packaging was created based on Paltrow's sophisticated and modern esthetic. The gold outer packaging and pink label reflect her feminine charm and effortless beauty.

Feminine nostalgia, space-age fashion hit the runways

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Since the hub of fashion long ago expanded beyond the confines of Parisian couture, it seems that nearly everyone has something to say about fashion.

"Fashion Week" has become a loosely used term to mean the celebration of expression of style in runways in nearly every city from Cape Town to Moscow and other parts of the world. And with such an international interpretation of what's fashionable, it's helpful to pinpoint the most important statements being made this season.

What is most remarkable for spring and summer 2007 is how divergent the two main focuses of designers seemed to be.

On one hand, designers were feeling nostalgic for old-fashioned romanticism. Combining references from the 1920s, '40s and '60's, they seemed to be grasping for that simplistic sense of femininity that has eluded the overly complicated and sexified fashion of the new millennium.

Feminine nostalgia took form in the flowers and greenery that quite literally filled the runways of Yves Saint Laurent (models strutted though a bed of purple violas!), Louis Vuitton and Marc Jacobs. At Vuitton, flowers peeked out of every layer of clothing, creating as casually chic an impression as one would hope for in a modern show. Newcomer Erin Fetherston's debut was no exception as petal shapes reappeared on her dresses, in the models' hair and even tied to their sandals.

In an interesting twist to this retro approach, turbans have been brought back from the Oriental craze of the '20s and appeared atop models at Ralph Lauren and Prada.

From the other end of the trend spectrum, we were projected into the space age of the future in which metallics and gladiator-like protective gear are the norm. In the standout show of the season, Balenciaga had models covered from head to toe in robotic yet strangely sexy uniforms. There were also wearable works of art by Nicolas Ghesquière, who has the uncanny ability to articulate the most outlandish ideas into fashion. By the end of the show, Ghesquière had models legs looking as if they'd been stolen directly off the body of C3PO!

True to form, Miuccia Prada triumphed this vision as well in both the Prada and Miu Miu shows. Referencing the Italian and Russian futurism of the turn of the century, Prada brought these looks into the present with her streamlined shapes and op art-like patterns.

In a blend of the season's two influences, Hussein Chalayan left even the toughest critics speechless as they watched outfits literally transform on the runway. Garments shifted from Victorian suits to flapper dresses in a matter of seconds while on the models! No doubt taking a revolutionary step toward the future of fashion, Chalayan covered a century of clothing in a matter of minutes.

Representative of the frenetic pace of late, the split of fashion messages has only expanded our understanding of the medium. Not only can fashion be an artistic mode of expression of the here and now, it has proven to be a window into the future as well.

> Nostalgia for old-fashioned romanticism

> Russian and Italian futurism

Germany backs fighting hate as extremists win more votes

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — Jewish leaders are welcoming announcements that Germany will continue to finance programs aimed at combating right-wing extremism.

The decision to provide an additional $6.3 million (US), announced last week by Chancellor Angela Merkel's government, "does not solve the problems of right-wing extremism in Germany," said Salomon Korn, a vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. "But the successful and important work of, for example, mobile advisory teams and victims counseling, will now continue."

The government's decision sent a "clear signal" that "democratic parties recognize the seriousness of the situation," Korn said.

According to new crime statistics, 8,000 right-wing hate crimes were reported in the first eight months of 2006, up from 6,605 during the same period in 2005. There were 452 violent anti-Semitic crimes reported in this period, up from 363 in the same period in 2005.

Several recent incidents have drawn particular attention, including the burning of copies of Anne Frank's diary by neo-Nazis earlier this year. In another case, teens in the town of Parey in the former East German state of Saxony-Anhalt recently forced a schoolmate to wear a sign saying, "I am the biggest pig of all because I hang around with Jews." Police reportedly have identified three suspects.

In late September, a Maccabi soccer team left the field after fans of the opposing German team, Altglienicke, threatened the Jewish athletes. Anti-Semitic slogans are typical in some of Germany's lower soccer leagues.

Perhaps most ominously, right-wing extremist parties won just enough votes in September elections to qualify for seats in the state Parliament of Mecklenburg West-Pomerania, making it the fourth state in the country with far-right parties in the legislature.

According to Germany's domestic intelligence agency, of some 40,000 members of neo-Nazi groups here, about 10,000 are considered violent.

Charlotte Knobloch, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said that "the aggressiveness we're experiencing is reminiscent of 1933," the year that Hitler came to power and began enacting anti-Jewish measures.

Korn didn't go as far, but he did call recent election gains by right-wing parties a "warning signal. The Weimar Republic did not fail because of too many Nazis, but because of too few committed democrats," he said.

Meanwhile, Germany's Interior Ministry agreed in Oct. 19 meetings with the Anti-Defamation League to consider cooperation on training programs for law enforcement and nongovernmental organizations. Further meetings are planned, ADL National Director Abraham Foxman told JTA in Berlin.

The ADL recently signed a two-year contract with the Austrian administration to provide a similar program there, Foxman said.

Speed up process for Gaza evacuees: Olmert

By TOVAH LAZAROFF
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert lashed out on Sunday at the red tape hampering the resettlement of the Gaza evacuees.

"We have to take all measures at our disposal to prevent the excessive bureaucracy that is delaying the process," Olmert said at a meeting of the ministerial committee dealing with the resettlement of the 1,700 families evacuated from the Gaza Strip and four northern Samaria communities in the summer of 2005.

While most of the evacuees now live in some form of temporary housing, only 21 families have made it through the bureaucratic process and obtained permission to build permanent homes. It is estimated that some 1,379 families still await authorization to build homes that replicate their Gaza communities. The remaining 300 families are assumed to have sought individual solutions.

It is now estimated by government officials that the time needed to build new homes for the evacuees will be three years, instead of two as originally estimated.

At the end of the meeting, Olmert said, "I hope my words will be put into practice in the field and that we will be able to find solutions within a reasonable time frame."

British religious groups opposing school bill

By VANESSA BULKACZ
JTA

LONDON — Jews and Muslims in Britain are often at odds on issues of civil liberties and terrorism, but they are united in opposing a bill that would require faith-based private schools to admit 25 per cent of students from outside the main faith.

As the bill was debated last week in the House of Lords, Jewish leaders were joined in their opposition to the bill by Catholic, Sikh and Hindu leaders, as well as Muslims.

The Board of Deputies of British Jews, in conjunction with other faith groups, last Friday announced the launch of a united "community voice" campaign to oppose the bill.

The co-ordinated response comes after Education Secretary Alan Johnson said the government would back an amendment to the Education Bill giving local authorities the option of requiring new faith schools to give 25 per cent of places to pupils from other faiths. At an Oct. 18 news conference, Johnson included existing as well as new faith schools, saying that even existing schools "must do more to defuse community tensions."

Johnson's support was an attempt to respond to criticism that the ruling Labour party's expansion of faith schools will lead to segregation.

The only religious community supporting the bill so far has been the Church of England, leading to questions about whether or not the bill would achieve its goal of integration. According to the Board of Deputies, there are only 40 Jewish schools, as compared with 4,000 Church of England schools and 2,500 Roman Catholic schools.

Some members of Britain's Jewish community fear the bill would signal the end of the Jewish day school system.

"The consequences of Lord Baker's amendment would be to exclude Jewish students from Jewish day schools," said Jon Benjamin, chief executive of the board. "This would frustrate parental choice."

The Jewish community has noted the success of its education system, which also teaches about diversity and inclusion.

The bill was expected to go back to the House of Commons for another reading Oct. 30.

Arabs, Muslims re-emerge in U.S. politics

By CLAUDE R. MARX
JTA

SALEM, Mass. — Arab and Muslim Americans, long in the shadows of American politics, are building on the activism they began in 2004.

Next month's likely election of the first Muslim to Congress, coupled with increased campaign donations and a voter registration drive, indicate that the groups are continuing to raise their profiles after briefly becoming less politically active after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

As of Sept. 30, seven Muslim and Arab political action committees had contributed a total of $160,000 to federal candidates, up from $130,000 at the same time during the last election cycle.

There are 52 Arab Americans seeking office this year, up from 49 in 2004, according to the Arab American Institute, a Washington-based lobbying and advocacy group.

At least 35 Muslims are seeking office, according to the website of the Muslim Alliance, a California-based advocacy group. Keith Ellison, who is heavily favoured, would become the country's highest- ranking Muslim elected official if he wins an open U.S. House of Representatives seat from Minneapolis.

The Washington-based Muslim American Society has launched a renewed effort to get the nation's 2.2 million Muslim registered voters to the polls. The strategy includes a revamped website, more voter education programs and more voter-registration machines in mosques.

In 2004, 84 per cent of registered Muslims voted – far above the national average – compared with 41 per cent in 2000, according to the Muslim American Political Action Committee. University of Akron political scientist John Green said participation levels increased because Muslims and Arab Americans were frustrated by what they felt was the singling out of some community members for harassment after Sept. 11.

The Arab American Institute has a voter registration and get-out-the-vote effort as well. It includes placing signs in English and Arabic in neighbourhoods with many Arab Americans, reading, "our vote is our power."

"The threats to civil liberties from the Patriot Act and concern about the war in Iraq are sources of great concern in our community. That is really motivating our members to vote in greater numbers," said James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute.

His organization has formed alliances with a broad array of politicians, including Pennsylvania Gov. Edward Rendell, a Jew, because Rendell has been responsive to Arab American concerns on economic and civil rights issues.

Officials of four Muslim advocacy organizations did not return requests for comment.

Of the 3.5 million or so Arab Americans in the United States, 60 per cent are Christian. Significant concentrations of Arab Americans live in California, Florida, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania, all of which have closely watched races this year.

Approximately 4.7 million Muslims live in the United States, more than 80 per cent of them black Muslims or non-Arabs from South Asia. California, Illinois, New York, Pennsylvania and Texas have the largest number of mosques, according to the U.S. State Department.

"The Muslim and Arab communities around Detroit can make a significant difference in individual races, but elsewhere they don't have the numbers," the University of Akron's Green said.

In 2004, Arab Americans and Muslims supported Senator John Kerry over President George W. Bush by 72 per cent to 28 per cent. In 2000, Bush received 46 per cent of their support, according to exit polls.

A survey of 1,000 registered Muslim voters by the Council on American-Islamic Relations, released last week, found that 69 per cent believe a "just" resolution to the Palestinian cause would improve America's standing in the Muslim world; 66 per cent support working toward normalization of relations with Iran; 55 per cent are afraid that the war on terrorism has become a war on Islam; 12 per cent believe the war in Iraq was a worthwhile effort; and just 10 per cent support the use of the military to spread democracy in other countries.

'International community must take steps'

"To our great sorrow, Argentina is one of the main centres of the Zionists' lobby, but all the same, we expected the judiciary force of that country not to permit a judge to put under question its entire credibility."

Qorban-Ali Dorri-Najafabadi alleged the previous Argentine judge in the case "had been bribed by the Zionists and the Americans" and said that "after the passage of so many years and having declared the file as closed... in order to divert the world public opinion, at the threshold of the International Qods [Jerusalem] Day, a new judge reopens that stinking file anew."

In Canada, meanwhile, Liberal public safety critic Irwin Cotler said the federal government should support issuance of arrest warrants against Rafsanjani, who in 2001, called for Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons to annihilate Israel.

He said that as a party to the Genocide Convention, Canada should refer repeated Iranian calls for the destruction of Israel to the United Nations Security Council and it should file a complaint against Iran to the International Court of Justice. In addition, Canada should draft criminal indictments against current Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Rafsanjani for advocating genocide. That would give Canada the right, under the universal jurisdiction regarding genocide, to call for the extradition of either of them should they leave Iran.

Cotler, who visited Argentina a few weeks ago, said the government of Argentine President Nestor Kirchner is making the AMIA case a priority because it wants "to make human rights part of the national culture of Argentina."

Cotler was told by Alberto Iribarne, Argentina's minister of justice, that "it's the right thing to do for a country committed to human rights, and Argentina's conscience would not be assuaged until these people are brought to justice."

Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed news of the proposed arrests.

"After 12 years, there has finally been confirmation of what earlier probes had long suspected: that Iranian state sponsorship of international terrorism had reached beyond the confines of the Middle East to facilitate Hezbollah's attack on the Jewish community of Argentina," Congress national president Ed Morgan said.

"Rafsanjani's presidential successor, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has uttered unequivocal, genocidal threats against Israel," noted CJC CEO Bernie Farber.

"The international community must take steps to nullify the ongoing threat posed by Iran to world peace and stability as well as its longstanding policy of sponsoring terrorist organizations, especially as this rogue state seeks to attain nuclear capability," he added.

The Leo Baeck Day School
Thornhill, Ontario, Canada

PRINCIPAL
Atkinson Campus

The Leo Baeck Day School is the only Reform Jewish Day School in Canada and one of the largest in North America. Founded in 1973, our school has grown to over 800 students from Nursery to Grade 8, housed on two campuses in the heart of one of the world's most dynamic and growing Jewish communities.

Our Thornhill Campus, located just north of Toronto, requires a Campus Principal for July 2007.

The Campus hosts 530 students and a committed teaching staff of 50. Our students are prepared to be practicing liberal Jews and to participate effectively in a complex, ever-changing Canadian society. The Middle School is a candidate for accreditation with the International Baccalaureate Organization and we are developing our own IB model for our Primary Years.

The successful candidate will be an experienced school administrator and possess a School Principal certificate or equivalent designation. You will be a person of integrity, a lifelong learner, and one who is passionate about Jewish education. You will have the ability to communicate skillfully and to build a thriving faculty culture. You will report to the School's Director and work closely with our Holy Blossom Campus Principal.

Aspiring candidates should submit a letter of interest, a resumé, and a statement of educational philosophy to:

Israel Briefs

Katsav urged to step aside

Israel's attorney general says President Moshe Katsav should temporarily resign. Attorney General Menachem Mazuz issued his advisory Sunday in response to a High Court petition by a lawyer who wants Katsav to resign in light of rape allegations against him. Mazuz noted the High Court is not the forum for deciding Katsav's fate, but he said he should consider having the Knesset declare him "temporarily incapacitated" until the investigation against him ends. Mazuz, who is responsible for deciding whether to prosecute Katsav, said if there is a trial, Katsav would have no choice but to step down. Katsav, who is suspected of raping more than one former female employee, has denied wrongdoing.

Schools recall killings

Israeli schools held the first-ever memorial ceremonies for a 1956 massacre of Arabs. Education Minister Yuli Tamir last week ordered that schools hold special coexistence study sessions on Sunday, the 50th anniversary of the killing of 47 residents of the Israeli Arab village of Kafr Kassem by border police. They were shot for violating a wartime curfew that hadn't been announced in advance. Three police officers were jailed.

Fence extension approved

Israel's Supreme Court approved an extension of Israel's security barrier to encompass communities deep inside the West Bank. The court ruled last week that the northern West Bank towns of Emanuel, Maale Shomron and Karnei Shomron merited inclusion because they had been "targets of harsh terror attacks over recent years." Palestinians opposed the extension, one of two that dip deep inside the West Bank, saying it would cut them off from their fields. The court said it will hear appeals if that's the case.

Rebranding Israel abroad

Israel's Foreign Ministry launched a drive to rebrand the country internationally. Senior diplomats and public relations executives, held a two-day conference in Tel Aviv last week to find ways to offset Israel's reputation as a country constantly at war. The strategy, once formulated, is to be implemented in 2007 with a budget of $4.6 million (US). Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said she wanted to replace Israel's "conflict" image with one of tourism and investment.

Yad Vashem gets large gift

A U.S. couple gave $25 million (US) to Yad Vashem, the largest single donation ever given to Israel's Holocaust memorial. Sheldon and Miriam Adelson gave the gift to enhance Yad Vashem's programs in Holocaust education, documentation and research. Adelson, who made his fortune in Las Vegas real estate, is the world's fifth-richest person, Forbes Magazine says. The donation is expected to help expand Yad Vashem's teacher-training activities in Israel and abroad and develop special programs for senior teachers, educational co-ordinators and shapers of public opinion.

Olmert visit to Russia highlights Iran differences

Analysis

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
JTA

Russia and Israel may be on better footing than they were in decades past, but differences between them over Iran's nuclear program still surfaced during Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's visit to Moscow.

Israel has made it clear that it will not tolerate a situation in which Iran gains nuclear weapons, and the Israeli prime minister used talks with President Vladimir Putin two week ago to urge Moscow to exert its influence to help resolve the international crisis surrounding Tehran's nuclear program.

"I leave this meeting with the sense that President Putin understands better than before the danger that is lurking from Iran's direction, should it succeed in realizing its objectives of arming itself with nuclear weapons," Olmert told journalists Oct. 18 after his talks with Putin and Russian Defence Minister Sergey Ivanov.

Putin did not address Israeli concerns directly, focusing instead on Russia's role in the Middle East peace process. Russia is a member of the diplomatic grouping known as the Quartet – which also includes the United States, United Nations and European Union – trying to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Putin's comments dealt mainly with Israel's standoff with Hezbollah, and in fact gave little hope that Moscow would do more to persuade Iran to give up its suspected drive to produce nuclear arms.

"The only way to get out of the vicious circle of violence is to stop making mutual accusations, free hostages and resume peaceful dialogue," Putin said. "Russia, as a member of the Middle East Quartet, intends to assist in a rapid stabilization of the situation and a resumption of the negotiating process."

Olmert's visit to Russia was his first foreign trip since Israel's war against Hezbollah this past summer, and came after Israel complained to Russia that weapons Russia supplied to Syria ended up in Hezbollah hands – just as Israel had warned when the deals were struck.

Olmert's visit also came a week before the UN Security Council again takes up the Iranian nuclear issue.

A draft resolution containing possible sanctions on Tehran is circulating among Security Council members, which include the United States and Russia, this week.

Russia has been instrumental in constructing Iran's first civilian nuclear power station at Bushehr and long has resisted a push for UN sanctions against the Islamic republic, arguing that sanctions could provoke a regional crisis.

Moscow also supplies Iran with sophisticated conventional weapons. In addition, Russia has sizable economic interests in Iran in other spheres aside from military, so any international sanctions could hurt Russian companies working there.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov's comments on Iran probably disappointed the Israeli delegation.

Lavrov appeared to say that Iran's nuclear program is not a threat to peace and security in the region.

"It is necessary to act on Iran, but that action should be in direct proportion to what is really happening," the RIA-Novosti Russian news agency quoted Lavrov as saying. "And what is really happening is what the International Atomic Energy Agency reports to us. And the IAEA is not reporting to us about the presence there of a threat to peace and security."

Still, Russian leaders tried to convince the Israelis of their friendship. Olmert's visit coincided with the 15th anniversary of Israel's re-establishment of diplomatic ties with Russia after the breakup of the Soviet Union.

Putin said Israel-Russia ties had been "completely transformed" in recent years and now were based on a great degree of trust.

Olmert, for his part, recalled Putin's promise during his visit to Israel last year that "Russia's relations in the Middle East will no longer be one-sided."

Since the collapse of communism, Russia has failed to match the huge influence the Soviet Union once wielded in the Middle East, when it pursued a strongly pro-Arab position to counteract U.S. support for Israel.

Yet Russia today increasingly is acting to counterbalance what it may see as the United States' pro-Israel tilt. Russia often seems to ignore or dismiss Israeli security concerns, but Olmert tried to play down the differences.

Israel understands that Russia "has an independent policy in the region," he told reporters in Moscow. "Of course, we are not always satisfied with this policy. We have our differences. I have said this openly to President Putin."

During an Oct. 19 meeting with members of the Moscow Jewish community, Olmert said he has a positive feeling about Russian-Israeli relations.

"At the meeting with the Russian president, I felt his friendly attitude toward Israel, and I'm convinced that our relations and his commitment to Israel's security are absolutely firm," Olmert said. "Our co-operation is developing in different fields and it influences all spheres of our life – political, economical, scientific, technological, cultural and sports."

Joey Elias highlighted during Canada-wide comedy tour

By BYRON PASCOE & PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

"The Jewish people have been through a lot. It was through laughter and music that we survived. Also for some odd reason Jews have a great ability to tell a story," says Montreal-born and raised Jewish comedian Joey Elias.

Joey Elias

"Really, food fell from the heavens and tasted like anything you wanted – now that is some story."

Elias performs during this year's Lipton Just For Laughs Comedy Tour along with Greg Proops of the hit improv show Whose Line Is It Anyway? Proops has appeared on the late-night shows The Late Late Show with Craig Ferguson and The Jimmy Kimmel Show and on prime-time TV shows The Drew Carey Show and Just Shoot Me. He's sold out the Edinburgh Fringe Festival 17 years running.

The tour also includes standup comedians Todd Lynn, John Caparulo, Jim David, Tommy Tiernan and Tim Nutt.

"In five years time, you'll be talking about all those guys and how you saw them before they were all big stars," Elias says.

"Tommy Tiernan is already Europe's biggest star, and it's only a matter of time before he conquers North America. I can't believe I'm on the same show as these guys. It is an honour."

As a comedian, Elias evolved from being a scared, nervous amateur to a neurotic, storytelling Jewish man, he says. He began performing in 1992 and has since appeared in 10 Just For Laughs Festivals, including this past summer's gala in Montreal.

"As I get older, I talk about more topics. When I was 20, I never talked about health issues because I never really cared about them. Now at 34 and being in a serious relationship, I do talk about them because they matter. So as I get older, my range of topics gets wider, but my character will, hopefully, stay the same," he says.

Technology has had many effects on entertainment, and in the standup comedy world it has meant that people are watching comedy on small, wireless screens.

"It is a great vehicle to get your name out there to the public. If someone sees a 10- to 20-second clip on their cellphone and finds it funny, then hopefully they will look you up and go see you at the local comedy club," Elias says."[But] no matter what, nothing can replace seeing a good comedian live."

Elias has been to Afghanistan to entertain Canadian troops and appeared on the big screen with roles in The Wool Cap with William H. Macy and The Day After Tomorrow with Dennis Quaid.

The Lipton Just For Laughs Comedy Tour 2006 itinerary includes Montreal (Nov 1), Hamilton (Nov 2), Toronto (Nov 3), London (Nov 4), Ottawa (Nov 5), Thunder Bay (Nov 7), Saskatoon (Nov 9), Regina (Nov 10), Winnipeg (Nov 11), Brandon (Nov 12), Fort McMurray (Nov 14), Banff (Nov 16), Calgary (Nov 17), Lethbridge (Nov 18), Red Deer (Nov 19), Edmonton (Nov 21), Kelowna (Nov 23), Vancouver (Nov 24) and Victoria (Nov. 25).

Terezin children's poems featured in Oratorio

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

An internationally acclaimed choral production featuring poetry penned by children of the Holocaust is coming to Toronto.

Oratorio Terezin will be performed on Nov. 11 and 12 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Composer Ruth Fazal drew inspiration to write the powerful work after reading the book I Never Saw Another Butterfly, a collection of children's artwork and poems from the Terezin Concentration Camp.

"As I was reading the book, I just had this feeling that I wanted to tackle the whole question of where is God," notes Fazal, who is a renowned violinist.

"That was a huge task and I kind of set out on this journey."

Fazal used 14 of the children's poems woven together with Hebrew scriptures as the lyrics. She spent two years on the production, which has drawn praise from audiences in North America, Europe and Israel.

The Toronto shows will showcase a symphony orchestra, a children's choir, an adult choir and three soloists.

"For the children's voices, I wanted the piece to contain simple melodies that they would enjoy singing," she reveals.

"I was aiming for their parts to be from the point of view of a child."

An estimated 15,000 children under the age of 15 were imprisoned in Terezin, a ghetto in Czechoslovakia. Only 100 of them are known to have survived.

The artistic creations of the children from the Terezin ghetto reflect both the despair and misery of their surroundings, but also a sense of hope. ,

The hopeful message is one Fazal seeks to convey with the performances.

"I would hope that Oratorio Terezin would spark a hope in the hearts of people whose lives have been affected by the Holocaust that God has not abandoned them," intones Fazal, who is revered for her Christian singing/songwriting.

"I also want people to see that Israel has a very important place in God's heart."

In addition to concerts across the globe, the project has included a Holocaust educational component for the children performers, who range in age from 10 to 16.

"For some of these children, Holocaust education was totally new to them," Fazal says.

"We took them to visit some of the places where this happened and they really connected. Some of the strongest bonds formed between the Jewish and Christian children."

Oratorio Terezin will be performed in the George Weston Recital Hall.

Freud and Hitler were unlikely neighbours in Vienna

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sigmund Freud and Adolf Hitler could not have been more different, but both fancied themselves as revolutionaries.

Freud, the Jewish neurologist and psychotherapist, tried to decipher the human psyche through the medium of psychoanalysis, a treatment he pioneered but which is now increasingly questioned.

Hitler, the Austrian-born German nationalist fixated on the reactionary racial concept of blood purity, aspired to be a painter, but found his niche in politics.

For a brief period between 1906 and 1913, these polar opposites lived cheek by jowl in Vienna, the grand, elegant capital of the soon-to-be-decimated Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Manfred Becker, a German-born Toronto filmmaker, explores these strange parallels in their respective lives in an intriguing one-hour documentary.

Neighbours: Freud and Hitler in Vienna, released in 2003, is scheduled to be screened on Tuesday, Nov. 7 at 7 p.m. at Tyndale University College & Seminary during Holocaust Education Week.

Becker, the writer and director, sets out his thesis early in the film: "Each man saw himself as a liberator and sought to convince others of the incontestable truth of his beliefs."

Sophie Freud

Sigmund Freud

Freud, whose theories on dreams, neuroses and sexual repression caused a sensation in mainstream medical circles, strove to liberate humans from the unconscious, the impulses they could not control.

Hitler, the failed artist who became a drifter, wanted to use those instincts and desires to "liberate" the German people from his enemy, the Jews.

Freud and Hitler never met, but they were aware of each other's existence. Hitler regarded psychoanalysis as the product of a deranged Jewish mind, while Freud considered Hitler a twisted soul.

Hitler might have remained an outcast if not for Germany's defeat in World War I. But as he lay in a hospital convalescing from wounds received as a soldier in battle, he had a vision of restoring Germany's greatness.

Freud apparently did not appreciate the significance of Hitler's rise to power in 1933 as Germany's chancellor. But when Germany annexed Austria in 1938, an event marked by Hitler's triumphant return to Vienna in a motorcade, Freud's days there were numbered.

After Freud's daughter, Anna, was arrested and then released, Freud and his family left Austria, settling in London. His four sisters, who remained behind, were murdered in the Treblinka concentration camp.

Neighbours unfolds to the melodious strains of Johann Strauss waltzes and wobbly home movies of Freud in various poses and situations.

It is also punctuated by interviews with, among others, Freud's feisty granddaughter, Sophie, a retired psychology professor in the United States.

It seems evident that she has parted ways with him. "In my eyes," she says, "both Adolf Hitler and my grandfather were false prophets of the 20th century."

Neighbours hammers home that point both explicitly and implicitly.

Mel Gibson's penitential projects

By RONALD C. EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In a recent interview with Diane Sawyer on ABC-TV's Good Morning America, Mel Gibson expressed his heartfelt regrets for his notorious, drunken anti-Semitic rant.

Some Jews watched the interview, while others did not, for various reasons, including the conviction – shared by talk show host David Letterman – that Mel's mea culpa was timed to coincide with the upcoming release of his new film, Apocalypto.

Some are more interested in the controversial celebrity's achievements, using the logic that Michael Jackson may share the title of America's Creepiest Chaperone with disgraced former U.S. congressman Mark Foley, but that doesn't stop his 1979 hit Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough from being a great song.

Many just want to see Mel's work. If he uses it to make amends with the Jewish community, so much the better.

But the film The Passion of the Christ created a rift between the actor/director and Jews. Here are some script proposals that will advance the healing process:

• Mad Mahmoud. Mel's production company should acquire this hot property, but he shouldn't play the title role. That honour should go to Tom Cruise. He is short, middle-aged and goofy, just like Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Besides, Tom needs the work. If the script denounces Ahmadinejad's low-down, Israel-hating, Holocaust-denying ways, it will show that his ideology is so over the top that it even offends Mel Gibson!

• The Michael Ignatieff Story. Gibson can easily identify with the silver-tongued Liberal leadership candidate, who alienated this country's Jewish population with his televised comments about Israel's recent war. Sigourney Weaver, Mel's co-star in the 1982 political drama, The Year of Living Dangerously, can play Ignatieff's former Toronto campaign co-chair, Thornhill MP Susan Kadis. This project may attract a Jewish audience, but it will also appeal to 1980s freaks, who will show up to screenings with padded shoulders and leg warmers.

• Columcille Ginzberg, L.A. County Deputy. Mel plays Columcille Ginzberg, a Los Angeles County deputy sheriff who patrols east Los Angeles. His life becomes complicated when his daughter Sara (played by Jennifer Love Hewitt) joins the sheriff's department and is assigned to late-night traffic patrol in Malibu. Columcille goes postal when a drunken celebrity motorist propositions her, after a "DUI" arrest. James Mee, the Jewish deputy who was subjected to Mel's rage, will be the film's technical consultant.

• Clifford Honohan, Protector of L.A. I could choose to, as they say in Hollywood, "go in a different direction," a more nepotistic one. A Jewish-American relative of mine, Clifford Honohan, was a Los Angeles County firefighter and reserve deputy sheriff in the 1970s. Honohan would be the film's technical consultant, of course. Mel might not be credible in this role, because he has no Australian accent. Besides, the latter more closely resembles the late Noam Pitlik, a 1960s character actor. In any case, Gibson can always act or direct.

These projects may, or may not, inspire a grand reconciliation between our people and People magazine's first-ever "sexiest man alive," but every one is a worthy alternative to Jackass III.

Former Torontonian writes for film and television

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

If Randy Pearlstein hadn't pursued a career in acting and comedy writing for film and television, he thinks he probably would have become a lawyer and now – at age 35 – would be leaving the law profession to write jokes.

The Toronto native, who acquired a passion for film before he hit his teens, left here after graduating from York Mills Collegiate Institute to study for a bachelor of fine arts in filmmaking at New York University (NYU).

His parents – Dana Kelly, a former teacher at Holy Blossom Temple, and John Pearlstein, a dentist – were "100 per cent supportive," he said.

Randy Pearlstein

As a student, Pearlstein interned for Woody Allen during the filming of Manhattan Murder Mystery and Husbands and Wives. "It was so much fun," he recalls of the time he spent on the set. "The mood was light and easy."

Pearlstein has been based in New York ever since, stitching together a career that has included acting gigs – among them small roles in the movies Center Stage and The Mirror Has Two Faces, standup comedy gigs, and, more recently, the teaching of screenwriting and television writing.

He said he's been fortunate in that he hasn't had a lull between jobs.

Although he had some experience acting in small television roles as a teenager, Pearlstein trained as an actor after NYU at the New Actors Workshop, co-founded by Mike Nichols. Nichols himself was Pearlstein's instructor. "He's a master of directing," said Pearlstein. "I couldn't believe my luck."

Pearlstein's current focus is on writing, although he moonlights as an actor. In a sense, he said, it's hard to break into writing "because writing is hard." But, he added, "if you're a good writer, people find you very quickly."

Among his writing credits is the 2002 comedy thriller Cabin Fever, and he recently finished a three-year stint writing for Comedy Central's Chappelle's Show, in which he appeared as a gay Ku Klux Klansman.

Interned for Woody Allen

Television watchers may also recognize Pearlstein from a Chrysler commercial that aired this past summer. He was the reporter in the passenger seat, interviewing DaimlerChrysler CEO Dieter Zetsche ("Dr. Z") before the latter crashed the vehicle into a wall.

Currently, Pearlstein is working on a romantic comedy film script. In a recent interview in Toronto, when he was in town to run workshops on screenwriting and television writing – with a couple more to follow in mid-November – he said he's trying to base the movie on relationships he's had with women he's gone out with, and also on relationships his friends have had.

"I think relationships are more complex than they're often represented in films," said Pearlstein, who described himself as "single and looking."

As a writer, he believes that "being honest and knowing how you really feel about things" gives more depth to any kind of writing.

Chappelle's Show, he said, had "a significant edge" and was "extremely silly," but its sketches dealt with some very difficult topics, including racism, an undercurrent in all of them.

Pearlstein's own ideas are based on character, he said. "I think the character comes first, and the funny situation follows… [As a writer,] your eyes are always wide open for anything either out of the ordinary or extremely ordinary, and both are very dramatic and cinematic."

Photographer documents mother's battle with Alzheimer's

By BARBARA SILVERTSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Rosa Leitner was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease in 1983, her family spent as much time as they could with her, says her youngest child, art educator and photographer Judith Leitner.

"She gave so much love back to us when we were with her."

Leitner decided to document the impact of the illness on her mother, and so for the next 11 years, she took hundreds of pictures of Rosa, alone, and with her family.

Leitner says she worked with these images until 2006, roughly seven years after her mother's death at the age of 84. "It took me 24 years to complete the project."

The photographs will be on display at the upcoming national conference of the Canadian Alzheimer Society, which will be held in the East Metro ballroom of the Westin Harbour Castle Hotel Nov. 6 to Nov. 8. Leitner's exhibition, titled, "Rosa, a Love Story," will be open to the public on Nov. 7.

"Love story" refers to the great affection she and her siblings had for their parents and for each other, Leitner explains. "We were always going home to London [Ont.] All of us – my brother and my two sisters and all our children – would come in from Toronto very frequently."

She recalls these visits as a happy rather than a "tragic" time. "When my children came to see Safta Rosa, they would play with her and sit on her lap. They loved going. It was never a sad time for us. We loved my mother so much."

Leitner, a single mother of two daughters in their 20s, wears several professional hats. She studied photography at Hadassah WIZO Community College in Jerusalem. She later worked as a photographer, and as a photography curator at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. She returned to Canada in 1983 after living in Israel for eight years.

The family left following the first Lebanese war because the situation was too dangerous for her ex-husband, a front-line medic, she explains.

In 1995, she co-founded the Toronto Heschel School, which opened in 1996. She is the school's director of art, a visual arts teacher and a consultant on arts-based education.

Her busy schedule during the academic year left her little time to focus on photography. says Leitner. "Every summer I had six to seven weeks to work the images of my mother."

She says it took time to sift through and develop the hundreds of photographs she had taken during the 11-year span. Her mother lived another three years, but Leitner says that she stopped photographing her because she was no longer a partner in the project. "Her condition was rapidly deteriorating.

"She was no longer truly aware of my presence and the camera. She often looked straight at the camera and smiled at me. Once she couldn't do that, I did not want to take any more pictures."

Leitner opted for a labour-intensive photo-development technique. "I was looking for a photographic mode that would best express my mother's illness and her personality."

She chose Polaroid emulsion lift, a process which lifts the image off its backing so that it can be transferred to another surface.

"The image becomes very painterly and has a translucent quality. The translucent quality of the images and the resilience of the hand-made Japanese paper I used reflects my mother's inner strength and spirit.

"She was a Holocaust survivor. So was my father. (He died in 1997). They were truly an inspiration to all of us. I feel I am honouring them by this exhibit."

In July, she approached the Canadian Alzheimer Society for financial assistance for framing the photographs. "When they saw the pictures they asked me to show the images at the conference. They said I give Alzheimer's a human face."

She says choosing which photographs to display was a tough decision. "There were hundreds of pictures. I printed 135 different images and then I had to edit it all down to 80 for the exhibit."

Leitner says that she was able to document her mother's decline. "You can see the changes. She aged very rapidly.

"You can see her initial confusion and later her sense of being lost completely, but there was always a smile on her face whenever she saw her children and grandchildren."

Leitner recalls that in the earlier stages of the illness her mother could feed herself and light a cigarette. "One of the last things she could do was light the Shabbat candles on her own.

"She could complete the entire ritual from the lighting of the match and the candles to the gestures of gathering in the light and saying the blessing. She would smile and kiss everyone and then she would lose the moment."

Chrétien's 'shadow' reflects on long career in gov't

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For almost 32 years – an eternity in politics – Eddie Goldenberg was variously Jean Chrétien's aide, adviser, consultant, chief of staff and shadow.

In other words, he was one of the most powerful civil servants in Ottawa, particularly during Chrétien's premiership from 1993 to 2003.

Joining his staff as a summer intern in 1972, when Chrétien was still a junior minister in Pierre Trudeau's cabinet, Goldenberg worked for him until his resignation three years ago.

Goldenberg had a hand in preparing federal budgets, calling elections, formulating economic and post-secondary education policy, dealing with two Quebec referendums, managing relations with the United States and determining Canada's policy on two major foreign policy issues, Afghanistan and Iraq.

In addition, he fulfilled an "essential role" as an intermediary between Chrétien and Paul Martin, the ambitious finance minister who succeeded him as prime minister.

Currently a partner in the Ottawa office of the national law firm of Stikeman Elliott, where he dispenses strategic advice on a wide variety of matters, Goldenberg is in the spotlight again now that his memoir, The Way It Works: Inside Ottawa, has been published by McClelland & Stewart.

"The purpose of the book is to explain how important decisions are made in Canadian politics and government," said Goldenberg, who dedicates it to Caroline Weber, his wife, and Carl Goldenberg, his late father.

"I draw on big issues in which I was involved to illustrate my points. I had to pick and choose and leave out some to keep to 400 pages."

Goldenberg's interest in government and public service is due in no small part to his father, a distinguished Montreal lawyer, labour arbitrator and academic who advised Canadian prime ministers from Mackenzie King to Chrétien and who served in the Senate.

The younger Goldenberg was formally introduced to the world of politics when he finagled a summer internship in Chrétien's office. Chrétien was then minister of Indian affairs and northern development, while Goldenberg was at the end of his first year of law school at McGill University. John Rae, Chrétien's former executive assistant and an old friend, arranged the job.

Joining Chrétien's ministerial staff full time after his graduation from McGill in 1974, Goldenberg followed his boss to the Treasury Board, and from there to such ministries as finance, justice and energy, mines and resources.

And when Chrétien was leader of the opposition, Goldenberg was his principal secretary.

Having won the first of three federal elections in 1993, Chrétien selected Goldenberg as his senior policy advisor and then as his chief of staff.

In his book, Goldenberg not only dwells on the complexities of decision-making and the crucial importance of personalities and relationships in government, he also focuses on pivotal issues.

On the eve of the war in Iraq in 2003, Chrétien asked Goldenberg and his foreign policy advisor, Claude Laverdure, for recommendations on how Canada should respond to the growing crisis in the Middle East. Britain, at the apparent behest of the United States, had sent a note inquiring whether Canada would participate in military operations against Saddam Hussein's regime. Since the British demanded an answer before noon on that day, Goldenberg regarded the note as nothing less than an ultimatum.

On Chrétien's instructions, he crafted a statement for the prime minister to read in Parliament suggesting that Canada would not take part in a campaign unless it received prior approval from the United Nations Security Council.

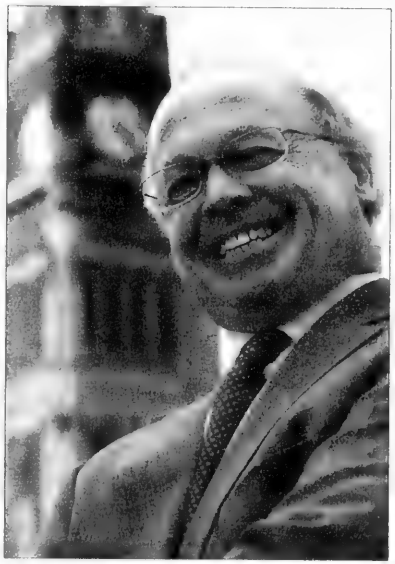
"The fundamental question was whether unilateral military intervention could be justified," Goldenberg said. "The Canadian government believed that the adverse consequences of such an intervention would be far greater than the benefits of bringing down that regime. Time has proven that position to have been very wise."

Yet Canada would have supported a multilateral UN-sanctioned military operation in Iraq, he added.

Goldenberg supports Canada's increasingly costly military presence in Afghanistan, but he has "questions" about its nature and duration.

In The Way It Works, he omits Chrétien's first and only official trip to Israel, explaining that the book is neither a biography of Chrétien nor an exhaustive history of his government. But Goldenberg does mention the fact that Yitzhak Rabin, the late Israeli prime minister, was the first foreign leader to visit Ottawa after Chrétien was elected prime minister.

"I met Rabin on two occasions and was tremendously impressed by his courage and his commitment to finding a lasting peace in the Middle East. Chrétien was a strong supporter of Israel, made lasting Israeli friends, and in particular formed a real friendship with [former Israeli prime minister and current deputy prime minister] Shimon Peres."



Eddie Goldenberg

Asked what he thinks of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's strong pro-Israel stance, Goldenberg said, "I don't have any problems with his policy on Israel, but I believe that he has created an impression in Canada and abroad that he is completely tied to [U.S. President] George Bush's foreign policy, and in my view, that impression does not serve Canada well."

In his memoir, Goldenberg reveals that David Berger – a Montreal MP who reluctantly agreed to give up his safe seat to Quebec politician Lucienne Robillard in exchange for the ambassadorship to Israel – enjoyed that posting much less than his role in Parliament.

He also discloses that Herb Gray, the first Jew to be a federal minister and Chrétien's deputy prime minister, was one of two ministers – the other was John Manley – who had "the most impact" in cabinet. Gray, Goldenberg said, "combined seriousness and intelligence with a good sense of humour."

Goldenberg is of the opinion that "ethnic balance" in cabinet serves several objectives. Diversity brings a fresh perspective to discussions, it enhances the integration of new Canadians into mainstream society and, in an era of globalization, it provides Canada with an advantage in international relations.

He agrees that Canada is not the same country it was before World War II, when anti-Semitism was rife and Jewish refugees fleeing fascism in Europe were barely welcomed here.

"There has been enormous progress in Canada since then" noted Goldenberg, who said he never encountered anti-Semitism during his lengthy career. "We are now a progressive, tolerant, multicultural and multiethnic society."

He said that Quebec's former premier, Jacques Parizeau, did not have Jews exclusively in mind when he blamed "money and the ethnic vote" for the separatist defeat in the 1995 referendum.

"[The comment] was aimed at all non-French Canadian ethnic groups in Quebec, not specifically Jews," Goldenberg said.

The most important file he dealt with was Canadian unity, he said.

"It was something that preoccupied me from the first Quebec referendum through to the patriation of the constitution and the enshrining of the Charter of Rights to the second Quebec referendum and the passage of the Clarity Act."

Goldenberg supports Bob Rae for the leadership of the federal Liberal party. "He would unite the progressive forces in the country, and would make an excellent prime minister."

Does he miss the excitement of politics?

"After many years in and around politics, I am focused on my career in the private sector and not on the past. But I am happy to give advice to the leadership of the party if asked."

These Waters

based on a true story

It all started out innocently enough. The pasha king and his queen were strolling alongside the stream running though the palatial gardens, followed by an entourage of servants. It was a warm summer's day, and the flowers were in full bloom.

"Beautiful, isn't it?" commented the pasha.

"Uh nuh," replied the queen.

The pasha looked at her, surprised. She was usually more articulate than that. She looked distant. "What is it?" he asked.

"It's the heat," she sighed. "I feel like I'm going to faint."

The pasha nodded in agreement. "I'm feeling rather warm myself. Let's head back to the palace."

"The palace? I don't think I'll make it that far."

"So what do you want to do? Have the servants carry you?"

"I don't know. I need to cool off somehow." Her gaze fell on the bubbling stream beside them.

His eyes followed hers. "So you want to drink from the stream? Not very becoming for a queen, if you ask me."

"I don't have a choice". She kneeled, and began scooping the clear, cool water into her mouth. The pasha cringed.

"So, feeling better?" he finally asked.

"A little. Not enough." She splashed some water on her face. Little rivulets flowed down her royal garments, mixing with mud she was sitting in.

"Stop!" bellowed the pasha. "You are going too far! I am the pasha, and your dignity is my dignity. Get up, now!"

"I don't have the strength," she moaned. "I really feel like I'm going to pass out."

She paused. "I need to go into the water."

"Never!" thundered the pasha. "Let them say the queen fainted a hundred times, but never that she waded into a stream like a peasant girl. Get up now, do you hear me?"

The servants looked at one other uncomfortably. They had never seen the pasha this angry before.

The pasha kept on ranting. "I forbid you to enter these waters! I forbid you!"

The queen looked up, her tears mixing with the water on her her face. "I'm sorry," she sobbed. "I have to."

And with as much dignity as she could manage, she threw herself into the stream.

"I can't believe it," seethed the pasha, turning to his servants. "Can you believe this display of utter impudence?"

The servants looked down, afraid to say anything.

The pasha didn't stop. "To disobey my explicit order? By law, for such rebellion, she has to..."

He froze, as the awful reality set in.

"...She has to die," he finished, in a whisper. "Oh, no. What have I done? It wasn't her fault. She was feeling faint. She had to do it. She's a good queen, really. I don't want her killed!"

But the law is the law.

For days the pasha agonized over his rash words, consulting with all the legal experts of the empire, but the verdict was unanimous. The queen must die.

The law is the law.

The story spread throughout the empire. Everybody felt bad, but there was nothing to be done.

The law is the law.

So when the chacham (rabbi) showed up at the palace and said he had a way to spare the queen's life, he was admitted right away. The pasha was desperate, but wary. After all, no one else had thought of anything.

"Will the pasha please tell me exactly what he told the queen?" asked the chacham.

For the umpteenth time, the pasha repeated his words, as if reliving a nightmare.

"I forbid you to bathe in these waters."

"And she went in immediately?"

"No, she waited a few seconds...I know where you're going, but the judges have already said that her hesitation does not affect her sentence."

"No, very good, very good. You see, if the pasha had said, 'Don't bathe in the stream,' well,' she did bathe in the stream. Or if it had been a lake, and the pasha said, 'Don't bathe in these waters,' well, she did. But a stream, you see, the water in a stream is constantly flowing. By the time she went in, 'these waters' that she was banned from entering had already moved downstream, replaced by different water, with no such prohibition attached.

"So while in spirit she may have violated the pasha's orders, technically she did nothing wrong."

The pasha looked around, astounded. The expert judges broke out in smiles, amazed at the simple verdict.

"Blessed is the God of the Jews!" exclaimed the pasha. "You have saved me and my family from tragedy."

275 PERSONAL COMPANIONS WANTED

I am an attractive looking, Jewish female, of European background with a university education and my own successful business.

I enjoy going to operas, symphonies, theatres, reading and travelling. I am in my mid-50s and seek a long term companionship, leading to marriage of a like minded individual, since I became widowed. Landsberg hosts 'honest, passionate talk' on Off The Record

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The return of Canada's national pastime and a change in format was enough of a boost to give the country's longest-running television talk show its best season ever.

TSN's Off The Record, which began its 10th season on the air this year, enjoyed a 43 per cent increase in ratings last year thanks primarily to the return of the good old hockey game after the NHL lockout.

Host Michael Landsberg credits the show's resurgence with a decision made prior to last season to devote 75 to 80 per cent of the show to hockey, and he says that proved to be the right call in this country.

Since leaving his job as anchor of the network's flagship SportsCentre back in 1997 to take over a new show, Landsberg has established himself as one of the best-known personalities in Canadian broadcasting because of his ability to ask his guests tough questions.

His no-holds-barred approach with guests in the hot seat has made the daily program a must-see for sports fans over the dinner hour.

"One thing I wanted it to become right away was a place for more honest, passionate talk than existed in sports media at the time, where people would really tell it the way they saw it and not necessarily the way they wanted you to think they saw it," he said.

"My biggest expectations for the show was just that it would be different in that regard, that it would stand out because it was the place where there was less B.S. and more honesty."

The show's success has been attributed to delivering that kind of passion on topics that people care about on a regular basis, and Landsberg makes sure to remind his guests prior to every taping just that. If a show lacks passion, he's well aware that viewers will quickly change the channel.

Most episodes are recorded at the Rogers Centre a couple of hours prior to their 6 p.m. airing, but the show has the flexibility to go live when necessary.

Two new segments were introduced last season, and they've worked out extremely well.

The show opens with a five-minute Up Front interview, a hard-hitting one-on-one session with a key newsmaker, and concludes with Next Question, a rapid-fire question period with the same person that is both sports-related and personal.

A decision was also made last year to do satellite interviews for the first time, opening up the possibility of interviewing a guest wherever they happen to be.

In raising the bar, Landsberg said the show's producers knew they would be losing a lot of the eclectic guests who had appeared in the past, because they wouldn't be able to stand up to the hard-core sports talk that the show now primarily consists of.

Landsberg said he's content with the decision and feels that the job he has had over the past nine years is one of the most interesting in Canadian TV, because it allows him to be himself.

"I could never really been me on [SportsCentre]," said Landsberg, who hosted more than 5,000 episodes of the show from the time he started his broadcasting career with TSN when it came on the air in 1984. "I felt there were opportunities at times to show my personality as a performer. I want to be able to be honest with the audience and say this is who I am."

Gabe Kapler wants to stick with Red Sox

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Gabe Kapler proved to the Boston Red Sox over the final two months of the baseball season that he is once again healthy.

It's now up to Boston management to decide whether to retain his services, as the club's ever-popular utility player was to become a free agent 48 hours after the World Series ends.

The 31-year-old outfielder certainly gave them something to think about in the Red Sox Oct. 1 season finale with a bases clearing three-run double that put him over the 300 career mark in runs batted in.

He said he would love to return to the Sox next spring and was expected to meet with general manager Theo Epstein and skipper Terry Francona in late October to discuss that possibility.

However, just playing again at the major-league level is a phenomenal achievement after what the muscular, 6-2, 210-pound athlete went through over the past year.

Rounding second base on what turned out to be a home run by teammate Tony Graffanino in September 2005 in a game in Toronto, Kapler's left Achilles' tendon popped, and he was wheeled off on a stretcher, unable to complete his trek around the bases.

"I don't think I ever realistically entertained the thought that my career was over, but I certainly understood the severity of the injury," Kapler said while back in Toronto for the team's final road game of the 2006 campaign.

"The surgeon explained that it was shredded. It was in rough shape as it was."

Kapler returned home to Southern California for surgery the following week, but was back with the Red Sox in time for the wild-card clinching celebration and stayed with the ball club throughout its brief playoff run.

Boston was swept by Chicago in three straight in the opening round, a disappointing finish to a season that came on the heels of a World Series championship.

Kapler was a part of history when the Red Sox won it all in 2004, but he left for Japan shortly thereafter for more money and a chance to prove he could be an everyday player.

"It was a rather romantic notion," Kapler said of his abbreviated stay in the Japanese Central League.

"I had this vision of what it would be like, sort of a master plan in place. I would go over there, play every day, and come back [to Boston] and resume my career at a higher level.

"My mom used to say, we make plans and God laughs. This was a classic example of that."

Kapler signed a one-year, $2-million deal with the Yomiuri Giants and hit .153 [17 – 111] with three homers and six RBIs in 38 games. He also received a $700,000 signing bonus, a figure that nearly matched the $750,000 he received from Boston in 2004.

He was placed on the inactive list by mid-season, released from his contract in July, and signed by Boston just a few hours after clearing waivers.

"I was a bit homesick," he said. "I missed my Red Sox teammates and the city of Boston. I felt an empty space in my heart.

"I wasn't healthy over there. I never quite got into a groove, and certainly longed to be back in Boston."

He joined the club at the end of July, following a DL stint and rehab assignment necessitated by a lower back strain.

Being back in Boston also gave him a chance to get back to work on his charity, a family-run organization that was established two years ago to educate the public about domestic violence and help women escape abusive relationships.

He and wife Lisa co-founded the Gabe Kapler Foundation after much talk about wanting to do what they could to prevent other women from suffering as she did. At age 14, Lisa was physically and emotionally abused by her high school boyfriend and suffered at his hands for three long years.

"We are in battered women's shelters in Southern California implementing educational programs for mothers to pick the pieces of their lives back up," Kapler said. "My wife is hands-on in the shelters, and I'm the chief fundraiser.

"It's a small organization, but it makes a large impact. It's a perfect fit for us."

Israeli juniors thump Canadian camp all-stars

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Israeli under-18 hockey team looked as sharp as ever on its recent North American training tour.

On Saturday Oct. 21, the Israeli International Ice Hockey Federation's (IIHF) junior squad concluded its two-week trip with a game against the Jewish Camp Select All-Stars at Toronto's North York Centennial Arena.

Prior to the game, a special ceremony was held at centre ice, followed by a moment of silence, for Thom Farkash, the Toronto-born Israeli soldier killed during Israel's recent conflict with Hezbollah.

A vociferous crowd of nearly 1,000 people came out the game. Fans seemed content to cheer on both teams with equal gusto – as one spectator observed, "Tonight, we're all Israeli."

In the end, it was no contest: the final score was 14-3 in favour of the Israeli juniors.

They dominated play from the outset, displaying superior positioning, discipline and scoring ability. Talented forwards Daniel Erlich and Ethan Wereck tallied 10 and eight points, respectively.

The All-Stars did all they could to keep up with the more polished Israelis, often using a gritty, hard-hitting approach to slow down their opponents, but Israel's skills proved too great for the hastily assembled local team.

"Tonight was not typical," said Jean Perron, Israel's head coach. "We met some better clubs [before this game] and realized that we had to be in better shape. We've got a very young club but we accomplished a lot in the last two weeks."

IIHF chairman Alan Maislin concurred.

"I think we look OK. We're pleasantly surprised at the team in terms of the results," said Maislin, referring to Israel's 5-2 winning record on their trip.

"The progress of the kids has been phenomenal, they've really gotten better over the trip. So we're excited," he said.

Despite the lopsided outcome, the Toronto crowd enjoyed itself. Fans were further thrilled by some high-profile, surprise guests at the game, most notably Liberal MP and former Montreal Canadiens star goalie Ken Dryden, who arrived at the end of the second period to take in the match.

"This is amazing," noted the hockey legend, referring to the enthusiasm of the spectators and the caliber of play being demonstrated by the Israeli team.

He was quickly swamped by autograph-seekers, and he graciously signed as many ticket stubs as he could before being shepherded away by his assistants.

Other notables in attendance included Ted Saskin, executive director of the National Hockey League Players Association and Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh.

"They're looking better," Saskin said of the Israeli team. "The coaching and hard work is paying dividends for them."

Speaking to reporters after the game, Perron was upbeat about this year's junior team and their chances in a harder classification level at the world championships in Hungary in April 2007.

"Nobody gives us a chance in division two," he said. "But… we have a chance to stay. This is our goal."

That's why he made it clear to the team that there's only one sure method for success this year: teamwork.

"I told my players this tour… there can be no cliques of Russian-born players or Canadian-born players or Israeli-born players," said Perron. "Everybody has to be together. It's the only way we're gonna survive."

Perron also stressed the importance of a successful Israeli hockey program.

"Every time we go to a championship and win a medal, it's a small step for us as a team, but it's a big step for Israel," he said. "We are ambassadors for Israel. One of our objectives is to fight anti-Semitism. And by playing in North America and playing world championships… we bring a good image about Israel. It's a place where you have great human beings."

The Israeli junior team headed back home the day after the game. They open training camp in Budapest, Hungary on April 10 in preparation for opening matches on April 14.

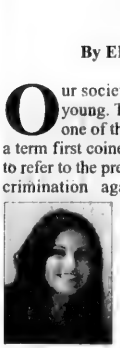
Age discrimination: why it must end

By ELLIE BERGER

Guest Voice



Our society is obsessed with staying young. The fear of growing older is one of the leading causes of ageism, a term first coined in 1969 by Robert Butler to refer to the prejudice or discrimination against people because of their age.

Age discrimination is an important and often overlooked issue.

Our community, however, perhaps more than others, should be especially attuned to the hardship and injustice that age discrimination can cause.

We have recently emerged from the holiday period during which some of our prayers made specific reference to unique human fears that accompany growing older: Al tashlichenu l'eit ziknah – do not cast us aside when we grow old; Kichlot kocheinu, al t'azveinu – when our faculties wane, do not abandon us.

These prayers represent a deep-rooted fear that many of us have about our own old age. But how can we expect our prayers to be answered if we do not first take steps as a society to protect today's older population?

While ageism is quite widespread in western societies, and occurs in a variety of arenas (e.g. health care, housing), I would like to provide examples from my research on age discrimination in the workplace. By the year 2015, older workers aged 45-65 will represent close to half of the working-age population. Yet it does not appear that employers' hiring policies reflect the ever-changing reality of workplace demographics.

Once unemployed, older workers take considerably longer than younger ones to become re-employed, due in large part to the existence of age discrimination. Provincial legislation in Canada, such as the Ontario Human Rights Code, is designed to protect workers against discrimination on the basis of age. However, the Ontario Human Rights Commission reports that age discrimination in employment is very much a reality. In fact, the commission suspects that the magnitude of this problem is even greater than documented in statistical reports due to the difficulties of quantifying and proving discrimination in relation to the job-search process.

Research that I have done on employers' "unofficial" attitudes to hiring older workers supports these findings, as older workers believed that employers discriminated against them in the hiring process through both subtle and overt mechanisms.

Older work applicants explained how many employers advertise job vacancies with specific wording targeted at younger job candidates. Some participants also felt that employers scanned resumés to estimate an applicant's age by assessing the numbers of years of experience, number of jobs held, or the year a degree was received. Some respondents believed the job interview was used as a mechanism for hiring based mostly on a visual assessment of their age. Many respondents were told they did not "fit in" to the employer's organizational culture, which essentially meant they looked too old. Finally, some participants were of the view that the language used by prospective employers was a not-so-subtle way of telling them they were considered too old for the job – for example, being considered "overqualified" or "too experienced," or that the organization was too "fast-paced" for them.

Interestingly, in an attempt to avoid being considered "old" in their job searches, many respondents developed strategies to conceal their age.

Some job seekers modified their resumés by removing years of work experience or the years in which they obtained their degrees.

Some job applicants tried to change physical appearance

Many replaced a chronological resumé with a "functional" one, which highlights skills rather than specific jobs.

Some job applicants even tried to change their physical appearance, by for example, dyeing their hair or wearing what they considered to be "young-looking clothes." Several men admitted to contemplating shaving their beards or using toupees.

Overall, the research shows how important the factor of age usually is in the job-search process.

Older workers should not be cast aside – even when their strength does diminish. Employers should try to find alternate work arrangements that can be reasonably made to keep them in the workforce longer. With the aging of the baby-boom population, employers will need to retain and recruit older workers. Some already are. The Canadian Association of Retired Persons (CARP) annually honours the best employers for 50-plus Canadians. But these employers are the exception, unfortunately.

A combination of more sensitive hiring practices from employers and more careful attention to the ongoing age-oriented discrimination from policy-makers can improve things in the future.

But there is room for all of us to help eliminate age-related discrimination. We must treat older individuals in the manner that we would hope to be treated ourselves when we become older. We pray to not be cast aside when we grow older, but first we need to reflect on our practices and attitudes in our own daily lives that are harmfully affecting today's older population.

Ellie Berger is an assistant professor in sociology and gerontology at Nipissing University. Her research focuses on older workers, ageism, gender, retirement and pensions.

BAKED WRAPPED TILAPIA

Topping: 1" cube fresh gingerroot, finely chopped
2 cloves garlic, peeled, finely chopped
2 green onions (green part only), finely chopped
1 c finely chopped cilantro
2 tbsp safflower oil
Dash of toasted sesame oil
Dash of soy sauce
4 tsp dark maple syrup

Tilapia: 4 fillets fresh tilapia
unbleached parchment paper

Preheat oven to 400°F. Combine all topping ingredients in a bowl. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Place fillets individually on sheets of parchment paper; divide topping evenly among them, spreading it over the top. Fold each parchment sheet over fillet to form a packet. Place with folds down, on baking sheet; bake 25-30 min.

Melt margarine in large skillet over med.-high heat. Add carrots; sauté until carrots begin to brown slightly, about 8 min. Add apple juice and honey; bring to boil. Reduce heat, simmer until carrots are tender and liquid is reduced to glaze, stirring occasionally, about 15 min. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Transfer to bowl. Sprinkle with green onion tops and serve.

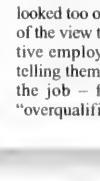
A Family Business for over 60 Years

My chevrutah

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



A few weeks ago, after a more than 20-year absence, I began learning with a chevrutah. A chevrutah is simply defined as a "study friend" – someone of a similar mind who challenges you on points of learning. Often, chevrutot can last for years, establishing a powerful understanding between the partners and creating Torah soulmates, of sorts.

The reason I hadn't learned with a chevrutah in many years stems from my disappointing Torah education and my lack of faith in finding someone whom I could connect with. As I wrote in this column a few weeks ago, Torah Judaism, like other religions, has in many ways been hijacked by fundamentalists who have squeezed the colour and soul out of Judaism, leaving a way of life, and a mode of teaching, that is too imposing, as well as devoid of excitement and the possibility for candid questioning and healthy growth.

When I've been approached by people throughout the years to study, I've been consistently let down by their insular beliefs, their indulgent attitude about truth, and their lack of creative learning ability.

So, over the years, I'd decided to learn on my own, studying little bits here and there. I wouldn't say that I did a great job in better understanding Judaism through my individual Torah pursuits, but I felt more genuine.

Now I'm fortunate to be learning with a fine chevrutah – a very wise Torah scholar.

In our very first session together, my chevrutah talked to me about life and its illusions. He quoted the tractates Babba Batra, Kiddushin and others on the difficulties of understanding the world in which we live, and taking things at face value.

My chevrutah's basic point was that life is intriguing and full of conflict, and that we learn with an appreciation of the many possibilities that exist, yet never quite knowing what indeed hovers around us, or within us.

Our chevrutah is refreshing. It is invigorating and revitalizing. I'm excited to learn about Judaism with this man, and I feel like I'm learning about Judaism and Torah for the very first time.

There are only a few teachers in the Jewish world who have the ability to see the vigorous tensions that comprise our existence and teach it through Torah in a way that projects this fascinating dynamic. Those who study Torah in a way that is accepting of many streams of possibilities are hard to find, and they're frequently marginalized by the mainstream Torah community, which sees their viewpoint as heretical and dangerous.

I believe that far more people would be interested in studying Torah if the Jewish world would appreciate the virtue of my chevrutah – which challenges and compels me in a way that is absorbing, charming, poetic and deeply meaningful.

If we are to be completely honest with ourselves, then we need to ask our yeshiva and day-school graduates – using comprehensive questionnaires and workshops – about what kind of attachment they have to Judaism and Torah learning after spending lengthy periods of time in these institutions.

It would behoove all parents – some of whom spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on their children's Torah education – to find out if their sons and daughters harbour a deep love and appreciation of Torah thought.

And then of course, we need to determine why so many other Jews who have never attended day school or yeshiva have a total lack of interest in anything that even sounds like a Torah thought.

People today are hungry – even starved – for meaning. If Torah is not taught in a more creative and life-enhancing way, our people will not be satiated by it, and we will have to keep trying to figure out why more and more Jews just don't care about the wisdom of the Torah.

Hussein sentenced to death

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Iraqi-born Israelis had mixed reactions to the news that deposed Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was sentenced on Sunday to death by hanging for crimes against humanity.

Mordechai Ben-Porat, who led the underground Zionist movement in Iraq in the 1940s and '50s and today heads the Babylonian Jewry Heritage Center in Or Yehuda, said Saddam "was both good and bad for the Jews. When he was deputy president in 1969, he ordered 11 Jews hanged, but when he became president, sometimes he helped them."

Regarding the sentence, Ben-Porat said, "He deserves it. We are used to hanging in Iraq, now it's his turn to test it out."

He compared the situation for Jews in Iraq over the years to a "pot of gold with a scorpion in it. From time to time, they were persecuted, and that was the scorpion. But during other periods of quiet, they saw the gold, and Jews were very glad because it was a good time for them."

Shaul Ben-Haim, a former Israeli diplomat originally from Iraq, called the ruling "adequate. The judicial procedure was inadequate, but politically speaking, the verdict was, [adequate]" he said.

Yehezkel Fattal, a lawyer also from Iraq, believes the verdict was "fair enough. [Saddam is] worthy of his punishment and the trial was very fair," he said. "As a matter of fact, it was more fair than the trials which he conducted for his enemies. This trial was a stage for him to express himself, that's what this trial was."

As the verdict of Iraq's High Tribunal was read on Sunday, Saddam shouted, "God is great!"

Former Star publisher heads to McGill

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Goldbloom, the former publisher of the Toronto Star, is going home, back to Montreal where he was born and back to McGill University, where he was a student in the late 1970s after graduating from Harvard.

But Goldbloom, the Star's first Jewish publisher, is not leaving town voluntarily.

In mid-October, he and his hand-picked editor, Giles Gherson, were summarily dismissed, slightly more than two years after they were appointed.

Last week, Goldbloom, a soft-spoken, thoughtful man of 53 who chooses his words carefully, met a reporter to talk about his brief tenure at Canada's largest daily newspaper. He did so on the condition that the circumstances of his dismissal would not be discussed.

Michael Goldbloom

The one-hour interview was conducted in the bright, airy office of the Star's director of human resources.

Goldbloom, a labour lawyer-turned publisher who hails from a prominent Montreal family, starts a new phase of his multi-faceted career in January when he officially starts his job as McGill University's vice-principal of inter-institutional affairs. He was hired by the principal, his old friend Heather Monroe-Blum.

But before he leaves the Star and takes up his position at McGill, he plans to put his papers in order and travel with his wife, Fiona Macleod, who was a manager in Montreal's film industry.

Asked how he feels about his unexpected departure, he said, "It's somewhat bittersweet. I guess I'm very proud of what we were able to accomplish in 2½ years. Working at a newspaper is an extraordinarily intense and rewarding experience. You're always thinking about tomorrow's newspaper. It's a unique responsibility."

When he was asked whether he was angry, he paused, then said, "Well, I expected to be here for a longer period of time. I guess angry is a fair word."

He is frustrated as well. "I wanted to have the opportunity to finish initiatives I started," said Goldbloom, clad plainly in a black sports jacket and a shirt open at the collar. "We were looking at a redesign of the Saturday edition, and I had just completed a comprehensive business plan.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Kadis Backs Rae

TORONTO — Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis is backing Bob Rae for Liberal leader, she said late last month. Kadis resigned as co-chair of Michael Ignatieff's Toronto leadership campaign last month after he told a French-language Quebec TV interviewer that Israel's bombardment of Qana in south Lebanon was a war crime. In a statement, she said she is supporting Rae because "he's uniquely experienced, truly devoted to public service and his fundamental principles are consistent with my own."

Library Gets Donation

OTTAWA — The Jewish Federation of Otttawa gave the Ottawa Public Library $12,000 last week to mark federation's annual Holocaust Education Week. The money will help enhance the library's Holocaust resources. Some 460 items have been purchased to date, including multiple copies of books and DVDs.

WORLD

Jews Protest Degree

GLASGOW — The umbrella group of British Jewry protested St. Andrews University's granting of an honorary doctorate Oct. 31 to ex-Iranian president Mohammed Khatami for "his efforts to encourage interfaith dialogue." Henry Grunwald, head of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, told the school that since Khatami has praised Hezbollah, "whose leader has called for all Jews to go and live in Israel so that they can be destroyed in one go, it is difficult… to understand what interfaith dialogue he is encouraging."

And the Winner Is?

TEHRAN — A Moroccan won a Holocaust cartoon contest sponsored by the Iranian government. Abdellah Derkaoui took the $12,000 (US) prize Nov. 1 in a contest launched by the official Iranian newspaper Hamshari that stirred international controversy. Iran called the contest a response to Danish cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad that angered Muslims worldwide last year. The winning entry shows a wall, with a gate resembling the entrance to the Auschwitz death camp, separating the Al-Aqsa Mosque from the rest of Jerusalem. Iranian Culture and Islamic Guidance Minister Mohammed Hossein Saffar-Harandi said the contest broke the "taboo" on questioning whether the Shoah took place. Organizers said they got 1,193 entries from 62 countries.

Cemetery Desecrated

AMSTERDAM — Fifteen of the 20 gravestones in the Jewish cemetery in Beek, the Netherlands, were pushed over. Police suspect the crime was committed Oct. 28. The graveyard, which has been in use since 1846, had just been repaired following its desecration earlier this year.

The Unkindest Cut?

SYDNEY — A Sydney boy's bar mitzvah plans went awry when two rabbis from the Australian city's beit din declared his circumcision unkosher shortly before the event. The boy is the son of the Sunday Telegraph's gossip columnist, Ros Reines, whose father was Jewish but whose mother was not. Reines had her son circumcised by a doctor in the presence of a Reform rabbi. In 2001, she joined Chabad and is in the process of an Orthodox conversion. Last month, five days before his bar mitzvah, Reines' son visited the mikvah with two rabbis who were to take a drop of blood from the penis, ushering him into the Orthodox community.

New Day School Cash

BALTIMORE — A U.S. foundation will offer scholarships worth $11 million (US) for students to attend Jewish day schools in Baltimore. The multi-year grant from the Harry and Jeanette Weinberg Foundation will be managed by the Associated, Baltimore's Jewish federation. The federation, which already gives more than $3 million annually to Jewish schools, committed an additional $1 million for each year of the partnership, which it said will allow more kids to attend Jewish schools.

Dawson Shooting Victim Leaves Hospital

MONTREAL — Leslie Markofsky, who was seriously injured in the Sept. 13 shooting incident at Dawson College, was released from hospital late last week.

He is the last of the 11 victims of the incident treated at the McGill University Health Centre (MUHC) to be released. Dr. Tarek Razek, MUHC's director of trauma, stated that Markofsky, 22, is making an excellent recovery.

His mother, Ida Markofsky, said the family is very grateful for community's support and expressed gratitude to the staff of the Montreal General Hospital of the MUHC for their skill and dedication in caring for all the Dawson.

Markofsky, a Concordia University student, was visiting Dawson on the day of the shooting. He sustained two bullet wounds to the head. Leslie Markofsky and his family were not giving interviews and asked the media to respect their privacy, according to an MUHC press release.

New BJCC to be built on current site

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Plans to redevelop the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre have been changed so that the current facility will have to be torn down before the new one is built.

And once it is, fees to join will be higher, project officials say.

Zoning approval was received in late September, following a reworking of the plans – including relocation of the proposed new JCC building to approximately the location of the current BJCC site, in compliance with new criteria about building on flood plains that have been set by the Toronto and Region Conservation Authority.

The BJCC will have to be torn down before its replacement is built during Phase 2 of the project, probably beginning in late 2008 or early 2009.

"I think in the end this turned out to be the right thing," said Peter Cohen, chair of the project's development committee. "I think the end result is a better one."

Members will have to make alternate arrangements during construction

An overflow crowd of about 120 people turned up for the 11th annual general meeting of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Oct. 29 to learn more about plans for the $100-million redevelopment of the site, which also includes the Lipa Green Building and the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The temporary closure of the JCC was not discussed, but it was mentioned on the last page of an information booklet handed out at the meeting.

Fielding a question about membership fees for the new JCC, Cohen indicated that they would be higher, but he didn't say by how much.

"The more people you have, the less you have to charge each person, but I hope you'll want to pay more, because what you'll get will be way better." He added, however, that fees have to be affordable in order for people to use the facility.

Sherry Kulman, the BJCC's executive director, promised members that inconvenience during construction would be minimized and communication about the project would be ongoing.

According to the booklet handed out at the meeting, alternate arrangements – currently in the works – will be offered to members while the new facility is being built, and an interim location will be sought for the BJCC's summer day camp.

The BJCC has more than 8,000 members, according to its website.

The 27-acre BJCC site is being redeveloped as part of the three-pronged "Tomorrow" project launched by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 2000. The working title for the BJCC/Lipa Green site is "Central Square," reflecting its position in the city 14.5 kilometres north of the Miles Nadal JCC, and 6.4 kilometres south of the new 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

Construction at "Central Square" will begin with the expansion and renovation of the Lipa Green building, said Cohen.

It's expected to begin next fall and last 12 to 15 months. The entire redevelopment is expected to take three to five years.

As part of Phase 1, a separate 30,000-square-foot "family pavilion" will be built between the Lipa Green building and the existing BJCC to serve as an interim home for day care, seniors activities and administrative offices. It will also have a workout area, Cohen said.

Honouring our authors

From the editor's desk

Commanded by God, from the very first forming of His covenant with us at Sinai, to "teach [y]our children" the ways, mores, traditions and laws of the rather unique and thunderously reconfirmed relationship, the Jewish people quickly took to reading and writing.

From that point on, the Book became the beating heart of the Jewish people. To be sure, oral transmission was the main method of teaching. But reading abetted teaching, and the Book (scrolls, at first) was what our teachers and our parents read to their pupils and to their children.

Eventually, over the many unfolding years of our peoplehood, reading and its double corollary – studying and writing – became as deeply embedded into the Jewish nature as flying is to birds. In the same way that most birds could hardly exist, could hardly experience the fullness of who they are without flying, so, too, most must Jews read, write or study.

Our Wisdom literature spills over with countless references to books and our reverence for them as typified by the adoring statements of the 12th-century Spanish scholar, writer and translator Yehuda ibn Tibbon.

"Keep your books well. Keep them from… damage because they are your precious treasure." Or, "Review your books at the beginning of every month. Arrange them in good order so that you need not work too hard to find one when you have need of it."

The reverence for books, however, also extended to the writers of books. For without the travail and the dedication of the writer (scribe), few would be the books available to read.

Yehuda ibn Janah, a Spanish writer who lived a century before ibn Tibbon, expressed the feeling well: "If people knew the many difficulties involved in writing a book, they would not be so derisive of an author when they found trifling errors in his work."

The sentiments of ibn Tibbon and ibn Janah were not merely a product of their time, when books were lovingly and painstakingly written by hand. They were a clarion for all time. Even today, some eight centuries later, they characterize our attachment to books and authors.

Thus, in most communities, at some time in the year, one will find celebrations of authors and their works.

Jewish Book Month is currently underway in Montreal and the Jewish Book Fair, in Toronto. In the spirit of honouring and encouraging our authors and their works, especially young, local writers, I draw readers' attention to The Rent Collector, (Véhicule Press), the debut novel by Montrealer B. Glen Rotchin.

The narrative of the story concerns Gershon Stein, an observant Jew who manages a commercial building owned by his survivor father in what was once Montreal's storied garment industry district. The building at 99 Chabanel – a metaphor for much of the depictions in the novel – is laden with problems, creaky and needing of repair in virtually every physical aspect.

But the narrative concerning Stein's collection of the rents and his interactions with the diverse group of tenants, is only the ostensible, first layer of the novel's tale. Much like any garment whose visible, surface texture usually rests upon and is secured by many underlying materials, The Rent Collector is a many-textured, many-layered tale.

In addition to the story of the crumbling building and its complicated tenancies, the second layer of the narrative describes the way Stein contends with the many challenges of modern life. As if he were the young patriarchal Jacob wrestling with an angel, Stein is constantly wrestling in his mind with ideas, theories, doubts and beliefs.

As my colleague Janice Arnold observed in The CJN last December, "Rotchin has done a masterful job of putting himself inside a fatalistic religious Jew who lives in his head much of the time."

He has a deft manner of expression. His observations are incisive, even cuttingly so, yet conveyed very often delicately. The book is a serious exploration of life, and one can add, Jewish life's important themes. But Rotchin is also playful and quite imaginative with his use of stylistic devices. For example, the following appears in a scene he describes at the kolel (Stein's place of study), where Stein and his colleagues are discussing a local political problem concerning the eruv.

"What's next? I'll tell you. Kristallnacht. Quebec-style

"Gershon had no desire to participate in the debate. He sat back and listened skeptically. Grynzpan always had something meaty on his plate to complain about. For Heller, griping was a favourite pastime…"

Only a handful of readers would likely realize that the Nazis gave the order to launch Kristallnacht, after a young Jewish man, Hershel Grynzpan, shot a German consular official in Paris.

Rotchin has written a very good book.

I commend it to our readers. – MBD

U.S. columnist paints dismal Mideast picture

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Syndicated New York Times foreign affairs columnist Thomas Friedman painted a dismal picture of Middle East developments in a recent talk at Holy Blossom Temple.

Here to deliver the first Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season, he described the U.S. presence in Iraq as a failure, called Islamic radicalism a greater threat than Soviet Communism and warned of the dangers of Arab rage.

Although he spoke in a folksy style, the message he conveyed was hard as stone and left little room for optimism.

Friedman, a self-described "liberal hawk," supported the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq. But three years on, he said, the U.S. mission to bring stability and democracy to Iraq has turned into "a complete, unmitigated disaster" as waves of violence and sectarianism convulse the Mideast country.

Friedman suggested that the Bush administration did not realize how broken Iraq was on the eve of the invasion, adding that Saddam Hussein's brutal rule and years of United Nations economic sanctions had a devastating effect on that country.

Confessing that he is at a loss at what can be done to improve the currently bleak situation, Friedman said that the United States should now determine whether its Iraqi partners share its goal of creating a multi-ethnic, democratic society in Iraq.

But in his opinion, the minority Sunnis seek the restoration of old-style Baathism, while the majority Shiites aspire to establish an Islamic regime modelled after Iran.

Friedman said that he will know whether the United States has achieved its objectives in Iraq when a Muslim dissident like novelist Salman Rushdie, who has a price on his head thanks to an Iranian religious edict, can openly deliver a lecture in Baghdad without being threatened.

In a stinging critique of American policy in the Arab world, Friedman said that the United States has all too often treated Arab oil producers as "a collection of big gas stations" whose function is to keep the pumps open, maintain low prices, be "nice" to Jews and leave Israel alone.

Saying that the forces of "bin Ladenism," or Muslim extremism, pose a greater threat to U.S. interests than Cold War communism, Friedman added that Islamic radicals are more dangerous because the Soviet Union was "deterrable" while Islamists are largely "undeterrable."

This is the case, because Soviet leaders loved life more than death, while Islamic fundamentalists are ready to kill themselves at the drop of a hat, he said.

In a deeply pessimistic assessment of undercurrents in the contemporary Arab world, Friedman talked about the population explosion, the high youth unemployment rate, the economic stagnancy, the widespread illiteracy, the lack of freedom and the yawning gap between Islam's exalted view of itself and the backwardness of the region.

Friedman said that radical Islamic preachers and rabble-rousers exploit the pent-up anger and humiliation caused by this sorry state of affairs.

The Sept. 11 hijackers – the "people of mass destruction" – emerged precisely from this milieu, he noted.

Friedman said that the Arab-Muslim world is in a dysfunctional state today, and that the United States has a profound interest in trying to improve conditions there.

Weizmann Institute program focuses on alternative energy

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Between the mercurial swings of oil prices and the rising use of non-renewable energy, the world often finds itself fuming over fossil fuels.

To help deal with these problems, the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel has launched a new endeavour called the Alternative Energy Initiative, which focuses on innovative research to develop sustainable and alternative forms of energy.

The project was officially kicked off at the Park Hyatt Hotel in Toronto recently at the national annual meeting of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

The meeting celebrated two landmark contributions to the initiative – $5 million from Israeli philanthropist Yossie Hollander and $1 million from Canadian businessman H. Thomas Beck, the former chairman of the board of Weizmann's Canadian society.

"I donated these funds to make sure we will continue to be a leading institution in alternative energy, a matter that is so crucial," Beck said.

The Weizmann institute seeks to raise $20 million for the initiative.

Funds will go toward a variety of research areas, including solar energy, plant sciences and biomass, high-energy physics and theoretical work, such as energy analysis and mathematical modelling.

Energy projects involving Canadians have deep roots at Weizmann.

In the early 1980s, the Canadian Institute for Energies and Applied Research at Weizmann was created, helping to build a solar tower on the research campus.

At that time, alternative forms of energy were rather new and cutting edge, helping the institute get an early start in a field that is skyrocketing today.

"Weizmann is one of the few organizations in the world that has more than 25 years experience dealing with solar energy and other alternative sources of energy," noted Hollander.

"That's why it's an excellent place for this initiative, and our goal is to get more and more people working on it, so that the next generation of students will be drawn to it."

Hollander added that the politics and economics of oil affect Israel's security, making the development of alternative energy particularly important for Israel.

"With trillions of dollars going to [oil producing] countries that don't want Israel around, that money is dangerous," Hollander said. "For me, this project is therefore urgent."

Also at the meeting was the president-elect of the Weizmann Institute of Science, professor Daniel Zajfman.

The particle physics expert outlined Weizmann's main objectives, including attracting more highly qualified students; enhancing research in biomatics, biotechnology, astrophysics and water and climate; and building new facilities at the institute.

"With 2,500 people on campus, Weizmann has a strong multidisciplinary research, strong international ties and excellent infrastructure," Zajfman said. "For the future, our three pillars will be our people, our areas of research and our facilities."

Darchei Noam breaks ground for its new home

Philanthropist underwrites half of $6.4-million project

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aside from the actual breaking of the ground, most of the formalities for the symbolic Oct. 29 groundbreaking ceremony at Congregation Darchei Noam, Toronto's only Reconstructionist congregation, had to be moved indoors because of high winds.

But an estimated 300 shul members, joined by local rabbis and politicians, generated their own warmth as they celebrated the acquisition and renovation of their own building for the first time in their congregation's 32-year history.

"The joy was overwhelming," said Rabbi Tina Grimberg, who has led Darchei Noam for the past four years.

The congregation has been meeting in rented premises in the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street since 1989. Two years ago, Darchei Noam bought Adath Sholom Synagogue's nearby building, located at 864 Sheppard Ave. W. (Adath Sholom has since merged with Beth Tikvah Synagogue.)

The building, which is more than 30 years old, will undergo a major renovation and expansion, with the help of an unconventional capital campaign that raised $6.4 million in a little more than a year. Philanthropist Leslie Dan and his wife Anna, who had no previous ties to the synagogue, are donating $3.2 million. The rest of the money was raised among congregants.

The renovation is expected to be completed before December 2007.

Six months ago Dan – who founded the generic drug company Novopharm Limited – didn't even know the synagogue existed, he told The CJN. He attended services after being approached about the plans, and was impressed by four things, he said.

Among them was the warmth of Rabbi Grimberg as she led the service. The rabbi, who has been with the congregation for four years, "reaches out and creates an atmosphere of study, prayer and camaraderie," said Dan. "It's just nice to be there."

He also cited the vibrancy of the 340-family congregation, the variety of its programs, and the number of small children he saw participating in services.

Rabbi Grimberg said the congregation is "enormously committed" to children and social justice. She noted that children were among those consulted about what they would like to see in the new building.

Dan, who has also provided significant funding for Orthodox and Reform congregations, said he likes to "see the Jewish people come back to Judaism."

Leslie Dan

After touring the Adath Shalom building in June, he challenged the congregation to upgrade its architectural plans, and tripled his initial commitment of $1 million when he saw the new design.

Now Darchei Noam will be able to finish both the interior and exterior of the building "to a very high level," said Alan Levine, co-chair of the synagogue's capital campaign and chair of the construction committee.

In addition to a new front lobby and new floor that will be added above the existing building to house a light-filled sanctuary, the renovated synagogue, designed by Quadrangle Architects, will feature an exterior of glass and Jerusalem stone.

The current sanctuary will become a social hall, and the redone building will be fully accessible, with more than 20,000 square feet of space. Also, Levine said, instead of having to use existing mechanical, plumbing and electrical fixtures, new ones can be incorporated that are "much more environmentally respectful."

Fundraising for the project did not involve a building levy or designated lead donors within the congregation, Levine said.

Instead, he explained – following "one of the key principles of Reconstructionism" – fundraisers used a "very democratic and volunteer-oriented approach" in which a team of canvassers visited members who had been affiliated with the synagogue at least one year, at home, to discuss the project.

Eighty-eight per cent responded by contributing money, including 80 households who gave $10,000 or more.

"Our largest [member] donation was $330,000, which by fundraising standards is a very small percentage," said Levine. "For your lead donor to give 10 per cent and [you] to still achieve your goal is very unusual. Usually you need the lead donor to give 25 or even 50 per cent."

"We're all incredibly excited [about the building], but we're more excited for the future of the community," said Darchei Noam's president Michael Mitchell. "It's a pretty warm and close-knit place. We intend it to stay that way."

PROJECT NORTHERN RECOVERY

A Time to Rebuild

After a nightmare summer spent in bomb shelters, life is looking up again for Ilanit Sigati.

The 27 year-old third year student at northern Israel's Tel-Hai College in Upper Galilee is among hundreds receiving scholarships from the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Jewish federations.

During this summer's Hezbollah rocket onslaught that caused death, destruction and trauma across northern Israel, Ilanit stayed on the battle line in Kiryat Shmona to be close to her boyfriend who was serving in a reserve combat unit. But she didn't earn any money toward her college tuition. So UJA Federation and the Jewish Agency stepped in so that Ilanit could return to school.

Now, Project Northern Recovery, the next phase of Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, is underway to restore normal life for thousands like Ilanit. To compensate victims of terror. To provide loans for small businesses on the brink of bankruptcy. To repair and re-equip community facilities and to strengthen northern Israel so that families stay in the area.

Today, the emergency facing northern Israel is far from over and critical needs remain.

Grotesque is now the Iranian norm

Abdellah Derkaoui has now ascended to the realm of celebrity. He has won his moment of fame, not to mention a prize of $12,000 (US) and the homeric accolades and smug adoration of the Iranian government. He is the sharp-eyed and keen-witted cartoonist from Morocco whose drawing was selected as the winning entry in Iran's Holocaust denial cartoon contest.

The Derkaoui opus that the judges considered worthiest above all others was a depiction of an Israeli crane piling large cement blocks on Israel's security wall obscuring the Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem. A stylization of the Auschwitz concentration camp appears on the wall.

Israel as Nazi Germany was the message of Derkaoui's drawing. This was an odd choice as winner of a contest devoted to denying the historicity of the Holocaust. Indeed, in his own clumsy, ignorant appropriation of the death camp imagery, Derkaoui actually confirmed the historic significance and unique nature of the Holocaust. That he should have been rewarded rather than punished by the Iranian initiators and sponsors of the contest demonstrates how simple and uncluttered the sole objective of the contest and subsequent exhibit of the cartoons was: to incite hatred and contempt for the Jewish state.

Derkaoui's cartoon was named the winner from among 204 works submitted from Iran and abroad that are currently on display in the Tehran Museum of Contemporary Arts. It should also be mentioned that there were winners of lesser distinctions and prizes. Together, they formed a wide, international, jagged arc of Holocaust deniers. Carlos Latuff from Brazil and A. Chard from France shared second prize of $8,000, while Shahram Rezai of Iran received $5,000 for third place.

The curator of the display, Masoud Shojai, shed further light on the objectives of the contest launched by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Shojai was so pleased to be among the arbiters of Iranian cultural and creative tastes that he announced the contest would be an annual event. "Actually, we will continue until the destruction of Israel," he said.

Thus, the contest was less an artistic exercise in correcting the historic record than it was an exercise in polemics and propaganda – indeed, it was a worthy inheritor of the frenzied and hateful labours of Julius Streicher for Der Sturmer.

The winners of Ahmadinejad's contest were announced one week before the commemoration of Kristallnacht.

It was in the nighttime and early morning of Nov. 9 and 10, some 68 years ago, that the Nazis unleashed their thugs upon the Jews of Germany. More than 1,000 synagogues were burned to the ground; 91 Jews were killed, and some 30,000 men and boys were rounded up and sent to concentration camps. It was ghoulish, violent grotesquerie finally raised to national policy. Political and historic grotesquerie, alas, has now become the norm in Iran. Pray that it does not hit the streets.

25 years ago in The CJN

Rabbi Meir Kahane, founder of Israel's Kach party and the Jewish Defence League, was arrested in Toronto for being in Canada without permission. He got a standing ovation at a local shul from 400 people for a speech advocating Israel's annexation of the West Bank and expelling Arabs from Israeli-held territory. He left Canada the next day, before an immigration hearing.

March awakened Zionist feelings

I am a Holocaust survivor who participated in the March of the Living to Poland and Israel in April 2006. My mission was to transmit my experience of the Shoah – my life as a very young living person for six years under brutal German occupation – to 174 Toronto students who were part of the march.

I walked the streets of Warsaw, Krakow, Auschwitz-Birkenau, Lublin, Majdanek, Treblinka, Tanov and Belzec. If only, I thought, the silent streets could talk and cry for our grandparents and so many other relatives, perhaps we could experience some consolation.

In my younger days, immediately following my liberation I became a Zionist. I was recruited by the Irgun and worked tirelessly for the cause in Italy for a number of years, until events forced my life in a different direction. After spending a week in Poland and Israel with the young students, my Zionist feelings were awakened. I am willing to work for Israel – the protector of all Jews – so the Holocaust and events like in past will never happen again.

Poland was very hard for me. All the time, when we were there, I was crying on the inside. But I did not show it, because I had to be strong for the younger generation who looked to me for support.

I feel every Jewish person born in North America should participate in the March of the Living. The trip helps younger people understand their roots as well as the suffering experienced by their ancestors during the Nazi years.

I will be forever grateful to the organizers of the March of the Living for taking me to the apartment in Lublin where I lived with my parents and family 69 years ago.

I never believed that one day I would march on the main streets of Warsaw with 174 Jewish young adults and chaperones and singing Hebrew songs.

The week in Israel was among the happiest moments of our trip. Visiting Mount Zion and the new Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial were most dramatic and emotional moments for me.

I will never forget the two weeks of the March of the Living.

Civil right prevails over religious practice

The Court of Appeal in Quebec in its decision in the case brought by Stephanie Bruker appears to have missed the point of her case ("Supreme Court to hear agunah damages case," CJN, Oct. 26).

The written document she obtained did not require the court to force any religious act or decree, or to force any person or tribunal to issue a get. The contract was a promise be the husband to "apply" to the religious tribunal to obtain a get. This created a civil right in the wife to obtain access to the tribunal.

The contract thus had nothing to do with the religious practice or the decision of the tribunal. The contract did not force anyone to issue a get. It only required the husband to live up to a promise he made in a written contract to provide access to the tribunal, if his wife so required.

In Canada, where a civil right and a religious practice, or even a so-called "right," are in conflict, the civil right must prevail. For instance, if in a particular religion it's necessary for a husband to beat his wife to show his superior position, in Canada, that would still be an assault, and the religious principle would give way to the civil right.

It has taken centuries for the principle of separation of church and state to become entrenched in our law, and this decision reverses this well-established law. Therefore not only should the wife be entitled to damages, but also to specific performance, since the act of applying was promised, and since there is no other comparable act that will achieve the purpose, the husband should be required to fulfil his promise, and not be able to use his sole application right, to obtain any collateral advantage.

The basic principle of Jewish law, is to promote the purpose of justice. The trial judge achieved this purpose. Hopefully his decision will be confirmed and the decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

'Lawyers without Rights' exhibit

It was quite interesting to read the Perspectives article "Lawyers without rights" (CJN, Oct. 26).

And while mention was made of the exhibit's Toronto showing, I am afraid that justice wasn't really given to the full extent of the exhibition's run in Canada.

Specifically, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies was instrumental in bringing this exhibit to Canada in, not only Toronto, but also Montreal and Ottawa. Furthermore, this included, for the first time, translating the panels into French, so it could be understood by all Canadians.

Partnering with us were not only the German Federal Bar and the Israel Bar Association, but also the German and Israeli embassies and consulates in the various cities, as well as the Holocaust committees in Montreal and Toronto and the respective locations: Université de Québec à Montréal, Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto and Ottawa City Hall.

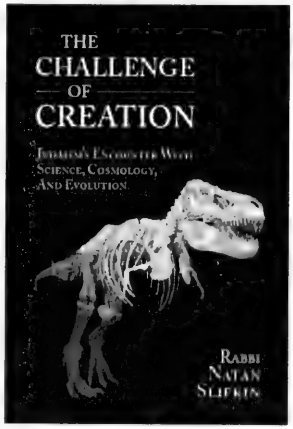
Perspectives

In the beginning: science, Genesis and the wondering Jew

By PAUL SHAVIV

Whether we read the tangled tales of our "founding family," or the mystical account of the origins of morality in the Garden of Eden, Genesis has always been the most engaging and the most challenging of the Five Books of Moses. But no part of it has exercised more attention than the account of Creation described in its opening 34 verses.

Way back, I was comfortable in understanding Genesis – Bereshit – as a majestic, spiritual account of Creation, containing in its short texts infinite spiritual truths. It was not a literal account. In the mid-1960s I first encountered Lubavitch-Chabad Chassidim who argued that the world was exactly five-thousand-and-some years old, and that God created fossils. But no one I knew – including several Orthodox rabbis took them seriously. It was an exotic sideshow to the Chabad "gig," which we all loved, in its uncomplicated, pre-Messianic incarnation.



A little later on, I encountered the "Orthodox Jewish scientists," who sought to demonstrate by elaborate interpretations that the text of the Bible did not contradict any scientific theory. It was noticeable that as the scientific theories changed, so did the explanations. While, again, the arguments were sometimes fascinating, I could never understand why they were necessary. But every year, I loved those few weeks in the fall when the New Year began with the reading of the powerful account of the beginnings of the world as we know it. I could listen to Bereshit being read from the Torah without being troubled.

I am still not troubled, but others are troubling me. For in today's Orthodox community, there are strong and insistent voices saying that you have to believe the world is 5767 years old or you are a heretic, with all the exclusions that are implied. Whether you are meticulous in observing the commandments or not is no longer a sufficient yardstick.

As has been reported in these columns before, the books of Rabbi Natan Slifkin are at the centre of the current controversy. Rabbi Slifkin is a remarkable personality, a brilliant scholar and, as is increasingly evident, a very, very brave and principled young man (he is in his early 30s).

Fascinated with animals since his childhood, and despite the fact that he has no university education, he amassed huge expertise in and enthusiasm for any and every connection between the animal world and Jewish tradition (see his website, www.zootorah.com). This seems to have led him to consider the question of evolution and the question of how to understand the biblical account of Creation from within a traditional framework. His published answers, firmly grounded within classic Jewish sources of impeccable Orthodoxy, nevertheless were not fashionable. The fact that he comes from within the "yeshiva world" itself seems to have particularly annoyed his detractors.

His rational but unfashionable views suggest that the struggle to "reconcile" science and Genesis is essentially superfluous. Since the biblical account of Creation is not, and was never meant to be, a literal historic or scientific account, the methodologies based on "science" or "history" are irrelevant to the Torah text. He goes one step further and embraces science as a wholly legitimate branch of knowledge, capable of illuminating our vision of the world in spiritual as well as utilitarian ways.

His new book, The Challenge of Creation (Yashar Books), a much-expanded and revised version of an earlier work, discusses three major issues – the overall relationship between science and religion, our understanding of Genesis and our understanding of evolution.

It is closely argued and well-written, and not without flashes of humour here and there. The first two chapters deal with the reciprocal relationship between the search for universal structure in the last 200 years of scientific theory, and monotheism. They are riveting – beautifully written and easy to understand.

Rabbi Slifkin goes on to deal with the grounds for conflict between scientific and religious systems and the limits (or otherwise) of religious enquiry. Part 2 of the book deals comprehensively with Jewish approaches to Creation. He surveys – patiently – each of the "literalist" defences of the biblical text – the previously mentioned "God created fossils" approach (first advanced by a 19th-century Anglican clergyman), the "previous worlds" approach, the popular "length of the day in Genesis" approach, and others.

He goes on to show, however, that the recognized boundaries of traditional Jewish belief have always included the legitimate option to regard the account of Creation in the Torah as a deeply spiritual but symbolic and not literal allegory. A secondary, but no less important argument, demonstrates that rabbis have always been ready to reconsider their beliefs according to the evidence or theories of different times and places. The validation of the ability to change, adapt and reinterpret has enabled Jews to encounter and respond to different challenges and cultural/philosophical currents in many different times and places.

Part 3 discusses evolution from a conceptual-theological point of view, surveys how Jews (and Christians) responded to Darwin, and shows – again – that a respectable group of impeccably Orthodox rabbis saw no problem in accepting the theory of evolution.

The Creation of Light by Gustave Doré (1833 — 1883) [H. Pisan engraver]

The Challenge of Creation is important for two reasons.

The first is that it powerfully and rationally argues that to be Orthodox need not indeed, must not – mean abandoning reason, nor need it mean rejecting science. That is as indicated – a courageous statement in an Orthodox world that has been hurtling in the opposite direction for the last 30 years or so.

Rabbi Slifkin's courage brought a firestorm down on his head. But his book is a powerful injection of calm common sense into an increasingly eccentric community. The small group of Orthodox who yearn to hear voices in Orthodoxy to whom we can relate – we feel like one of Rabbi Slifkin's ecologically endangered species – owe Rabbi Slifkin a huge thank you.

The second, less immediately apparent reason, is that it is a practical complement to recent, and important, books by Menachem Kellner and Marc Shapiro, demonstrating that the parameters of Jewish definition have always been fixed by tests of practice, not tests of belief. Being Jewish was always about what you did, not what you thought. That idea sharply distinguished Judaism from most branches of Christianity, whose test of faith was belief, and it can only be conjectured whether those who want to reverse those parameters actually understand what damage they are doing. (Given the equally strong movement against the study of Jewish history in the same circles, it is entirely possible that they don't.)

You may agree or disagree with Rabbi Slifkin. His book is the most intelligent and interesting I have read on the subject, although I do not share all of his beliefs or all of his approach. It is a remarkable achievement for a young scholar. But he is also making an important statement about the nature of discourse and the acceptable process of "machlokes l'shem shamayim – argument for the sake of Heaven" in the contemporary world. This civilized, respectful, erudite, well-argued, beautifully structured book is a revelation in a controversy that has been marked by crude and adversarial public mud-slinging. His opponents could learn major lessons from him in derech eretz, let alone in Torah.

Paul Shaviv is the director of education of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Opinions

Londonistan and Eurabia

Melanie Phillips' Londonistan (Encounter Books, 2006) and Bat Ye'or's Eurabia: The Euro-Arab Axis (Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2005) share common themes. Both address the impact of immigrant Arab populations in Europe – with Londonistan mostly reflecting somewhat more recent manifestations of the political and sociocultural phenomena that were so comprehensively described in Bat Ye'or's earlier publication.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The notion of Eurabia in fact pre-dates the author's analysis of it by many years. The term was first used in the 1970s as the title of a journal that was edited by the president of what was then known as the Association of Franco-Arab Solidarity.

As explained by Andrew Bostom (American Thinker, Nov. 15, 2005), "the articles and editorials in that publication called for common Euro-Arab positions at every level – social, economic, commercial – and were contingent upon the fundamental political condition of European support for the Arab (and non-Arab) Muslim umma's jihad against Israel."

Bostom comments further that "these concrete proposals were not the musings of isolated theorists – they in fact represented policy decisions conceived in conjunction with, and actualized by, European state leaders, their ministers of foreign affairs, and European parliamentarians."

For more than 30 years, the Euro-Arab Dialogue (EAD), as it's been termed, has provided the framework for an essentially anti-Zionist (and anti-American) collaboration between members of the European Community (later the European Union) and their counterparts in the Arab League.

And, as a not unexpected consequence of an emerging coziness, Europe opened its doors to mass migrations from Arab countries, thereby – wittingly or unwittingly – promoting a powerful Muslim presence across the continent. It's only within the past few years that the blinkers have come off and, in the face of increasing violence spawned by Islamic extremism, there seems now to be at least some realization that the alliance with Arabia was grossly misguided.

But even if European leaders do eventually emerge from their stupor, it's likely that the enmity towards Israel that was so integral to the EAD will not readily be dispelled. Sadly, such attitudes are also prevalent in a majority of European society in general. As elegantly stated by Phillips in Londonistan, "the British have largely swallowed Muslim and Arab propaganda, which has denied historical evidence, replaced it by mythology, lies, and libels, and reversed victim and oppressor in the Middle East conflict."

Londonistan is a relatively easy read; Eurabia is longer and a bit ponderous. However the two books complement each other in providing fascinating insights into the pervasive complacency of a Europe that has lost its backbone and steered its moral compass in the direction of appeasement and self deprecation. The lessons for North America are clear. Hopefully it's not too late to heed them.

Oh, that we were normal

Now and then, I get to thinking about how exceptional Israel is, and how, after nearly 60 years of existence, we are anything but the "normal" people we strove to become.

Take, for instance, something so elementary, so fundamental to normalcy and societal health as a precise knowledge of where one's country actually is. Due to a lack of willingness to make the hard decisions regarding what territories under our rule will remain ours, and which of them will not, we are suspended in a permanent state of limbo. For although a firm and courageous stand was taken on Gaza last year, the constant zigzagging in the present government's policy, talking boldly as it did in the beginning of "consolidation" and a two-state solution, only to retreat lately into almost total silence on these subjects, is merely one more manifestation of the same malady that has afflicted Israel for a generation – chronic indecision.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

And so Palestinians and Israelis continue to live physically side by side, yet in starkly differing realities with very different rights and freedoms. For we have yet to settle, even among ourselves, whether the West Bank is ours or theirs; whether to cherish it eternally as our Jewish patrimony, or flee from its destructive power; or whether it ought to be energetically annexed, settled and developed, or speedily abandoned.

This unnatural condition of borderless sovereignty continues to undermine our psychological well-being and tarnish the image of democratic integrity we seek to cultivate. And we should not be surprised, therefore, when foreigners call into question the sincerity of our stated aim to build a just and decent society along western lines.

But this is only one aspect of Israel's exceptionalness. There are others. Take, for instance, the intimate engagement of world Jewry in the internal workings of the state, and the far-reaching contribution of the Jewish communities everywhere to its social and economic development. This unparalleled involvement of an external population in the domestic life of a country is part and parcel of the uniqueness of being Jewish, of affiliations characterized by a sense of shared fate and deep identification.

The numerous commemorative plaques dotting the local landscape, the majority of them paying tribute to the generosity of Jews elsewhere, is the hard evidence of the closely-knit ties linking outside with inside. Indeed, the lines of divide can be extremely fuzzy. Witness, for example, the importance that Israeli politicians attach to fundraising and campaigning among Jewish supporters overseas, and the access that foreign Jews sometimes have to the innermost circles of Israeli political power. Though not necessarily commendable in every instance, it's a reflection of the special character of the Jewish people.

Then there are the diverse perceptions of Israel, which are often anything but "normal." More often than not, attitudes are overly passionate and lacking in balance, neutrality or objectivity. They may vary from, at one extreme, feelings of uncompromising hatred toward the Jewish state, vilification of it and even repudiation of its basic right to exist, to an uncritical, even blind support for it at the other extreme.

Adherents of certain evangelical Christian churches, for instance, are prone to view the modern Jewish national experience in exuberantly apocalyptic terms, as the pivotal link in a drama of universal redemption. At the same time, other Christian churches and bodies denounce the tiny country's policies and conduct with equal zeal, and their overly strident condemnations seem to betray an underlying theological discomfort with the very idea of a thriving Jewish political entity in their Holy Land.

Let's sum things up with a brief illustration: the State of Israel, within borders as yet to be defined or located even by its own citizenry, whose very legitimacy and right to exist is still widely called into question, is governed from a capital that practically no country recognizes – called Jerusalem – and from a house of parliament, the Knesset, paid for by a foreign national named Rothschild, on a plot of land leased to it by the official church of Greece which, if it so wished, could theoretically cancel the contract tomorrow and evict our legislature.

What's so terribly abnormal about that?

The source of Ignatieff's myths

As an Israeli, I don't have a horse in the race between Canada's major political parties and their leaders. But when the contest extends to allegations related to human rights, as in the case of Michael Ignatieff's offhand reference to alleged Israel "war crimes" during the recent bitter conflict against Hezbollah, it gets my attention.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Ignatieff's statements, or rather misstatements, are important not only because he's a contender for the leadership of the Liberal Party, but also due to his background as a noted academic specializing in human rights. Seen as a neutral expert, his words on this topic carry a great deal of weight.

And this is precisely the problem. Ignatieff's condemnation of Israeli actions betrayed an ignorance of the biases that have become prevalent in the human rights business. In response to the criticism, Ignatieff said he was merely repeating "responsible criticism" made by groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch (HRW).

An expert in human rights law should have known that the leaders of these groups and their reports are political and lack credibility (to understate the case), particularly with respect to Israel. As noted by Canadian MP Irwin Cotler, a former justice minister and law professor, as well as another world-renowned expert in this area, human rights is the religion of the 21st century. Political superpowers with huge budgets measured in tens of millions of dollars are the churches, and as in other religions, the power of dogma and belief can be more important than logic and accuracy. This particular dogma includes a great deal of anti-democratic, anti-American and anti-Israel rhetoric.

In the case cited by Ignatieff, HRW and Amnesty condemned Israel for a missile attack on a Hezbollah stronghold in southern Lebanon known as Qana. Lebanese sources at first claimed that more than 50 civilians had died, and this was repeated without question in HRW's press release and by officials in interviews. HRW later lowered the number of alleged victims to 28, but the information was no more reliable. Some of the caskets prepared for burial were draped with Hezbollah flags, and Lebanese reported that some of the bodies were brought in from outside Qana.

In fact, HRW and Amnesty officials have no idea what really happened at Qana. The best they could do was to repeat the claims of "eyewitnesses" who may or may not be inventing a tale designed to promote the political war against Israel. While Israeli civilians were bombarded by almost 4,000 rockets, HRW's "researchers" claimed to have found no cases in which Hezbollah deliberately hid weapons or launched attacks from houses, schools, fields, stores, or mosques. Having already found Israel guilty, they were not looking very hard.

This lack of credibility or consistency is not new – as an expert, Ignatieff should have known the details. For more than a decade, Amnesty and HRW leaders have been involved in campaigns to denounce Israel as one of the worst human rights violators in the world. In the Middle East, the main focus of their publications is not Saudi Arabia, Iran, Syria, Libya or the suicide bombers sent by Palestinian leaders, but rather the one democracy in the region – Israel.

HRW and Amnesty were also active participants in the infamous NGO forum of the 2001 Durban UN conference on "racism and xenophobia." The Canadian government (particularly officials in Foreign Affairs) actively promoted this conference, ignoring warnings that it would be abused to demonize Israel.

Since then, the participants have continued to promote the Durban agenda, claiming military expertise that they do not have and exploiting the rhetoric of international law. In Lebanon, as during the Palestinian terror campaign that killed more than 1,000 Israelis, every defensive action was denounced as "indiscriminate" and every weapon was declared to be immoral. In contrast, it took HRW three months to finally discover that Hezbollah was using cluster bombs to hit Israeli cities (Amnesty was only two months behind).

In order to restore the moral basis of universal human rights, it's necessary to end the ease with which unsubstantiated allegations are repeated without question by journalists, academics and politicians. To undo some of the damage, Ignatieff should lead the way.

The Kirshner File

Kristallnacht was a prelude to the Holocaust

Martin Luther, the Protestant theologian and the leader of the German reformation movement, issued an infamous pastoral letter, On the Jews and Their Lies, in which he advised Germans to set synagogues on fire and cover the ruins with dirt.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Almost 400 years later, in 1938, his advice was heeded with a vengeance. On Nov. 10, Nazi stormtroopers – some in civilian clothes – and members of the Hitler Youth torched more than 1,000 shuls, ransacked thousands of Jewish-owned shops and homes, arrested 30,000 Jewish men between the ages of 16 and 60 and killed 91 Jews in the worst pogrom in modern European history.

Kristallnacht, or the Night of Broken Glass, was a watershed in the Nazi treatment of Jews. From that point, the position of Jews in Germany deteriorated rapidly and sharply.

Martin Gilbert, the British historian, examines this cataclysmic event in a sober, lucidly written book, Kristallnacht: Prelude to Destruction (HarperCollins), which is based on his own research, eyewitness testimonies and newspaper accounts.

Many books have been published about Kristallnacht, which set the stage for the deportation and mass murder of German and European Jews in the Holocaust. Although the topic has been heavily mined, Gilbert's relatively concise but comprehensive volume is a worthy addition to the genre.

The expulsion of Polish Jews from Germany and the assassination of a German diplomat in Paris were the twin catalysts of Kristallnacht.

On Oct. 18, 1938, on Adolf Hitler's orders, some 12,000 Polish Jews living in Germany legally were given less than a day to leave their homes. Four thousand Jews were admitted by Poland, but 8,000 were denied entry as they waited at the border.

On Nov. 3, a young man in Paris named Herschel Grynszpan received a postcard from his sister Berta, who, along with her parents, had been expelled from Germany two weeks earlier and now found themselves forlorn and abandoned.

The following day, he read a newspaper story about the plight of the deportees. In a vengeful rage, he bought a pistol.

On Nov. 7, he walked into the German embassy and shot the third secretary, Ernst von Rath. German newspapers denounced the shooting and the German government imposed collective measures against the Jewish community. It was announced that Jewish children could no longer attend "Aryan" schools and that Jewish newspapers and magazines had to cease publication immediately.

On Nov. 9, word reached Berlin that von Rath had died of his wounds. Josef Goebbels, the minister of propaganda, used his death to further pummel the Jews of Germany, who had been subjected to a flurry of anti-Semitic edicts since 1933, the year Hitler was appointed chancellor.

Gilbert flits from one city to the next as he describes the animosity that engulfed German Jews at the instigation of the Nazis.

In Berlin, where the most widely reported violence took place, a naive police lieutenant tried to stop goons from destroying the golden-domed Oranienburger Strasse synagogue. He said that it was a historic landmark, a protected municipal building. The hooligans left, but the police officer was reprimanded.

Smoke fills the synagogue in Baden-Baden.

Elsewhere in Germany's sophisticated capital, however, restraint was thrown out the window. As the correspondent of London's Daily Telegraph wrote, "Racial hatred and hysteria seemed to have taken complete control of otherwise decent people."

The U.S. consul in Leipzig reported that the city's three main synagogues "were irreparably gutted by flames." And in Baden-Baden, a Jewish doctor, Arthur Flehinger, was ordered to read passages from Hitler's Mein Kampf as the synagogue was readied for desecration.

In Dresden, firebombed by Allied aircraft in 1945, the famous Semper shul, built in a mixture of Byzantine and Moorish styles, was also set alight. When firemen arrived to douse the flames, the SS blocked their path. The mayor of Dresden then proclaimed that "the symbol of the hereditary racial enemy has finally been extinguished."

Greed and theft were part and parcel of Kristallnacht. Arthur Propp, a prosperous Jewish businessman in Konigsberg, was jailed and held imprisoned until he gave up his three properties.

Herschel Grynszpan

Goebbels ascribed Kristallnacht to the "healthy instincts" of Germans. "The German people is anti-Semitic," he wrote in a newspaper article.

Pouring salt on the wounds, the Nazi regime imposed further restrictions on the Jewish community and announced that all damage to Jewish property would have to be paid for by Jews themselves.

The ripples of Kristallnacht reached distant shores.

The American president, Franklin Roosevelt, said that German Jewish refugees already in the United States on visitors' visas could remain indefinitely. But Roosevelt, wary of an anti-Semitic backlash, did not increase the immigration quota.

The Canadian prime minister, William Mackenzie King, told Parliament that Canada – which had taken 6,000 Jewish refugees from Germany since 1933 – would not throw its doors wide open to refugees, but would deal with "special cases on their merits."

Britain was more generous, but the British colony of Bermuda did not admit a single Jewish refugee. Many countries turned away the refugees altogether.

But in the end, Kristallnacht had its greatest impact on Germany.

Shortly after the rampage, the Nazi authorities said that the 3,767 Jewish retail businesses in Berlin had either been transferred to "Aryan" control or closed down, and that Jewish physicians could not treat non-Jews.

In the face of this blatant discrimination, Jews emigrated in droves.

Nearly as many Jews, 120,000, left Germany until the outbreak of the war in 1939 as in the 5½ years before then (150,000), Gilbert says.

On Sept. 19, 1941, in a throwback to medieval times, all German Jews over the age of six were required to wear a yellow star.

A month later, the first deportation train from Germany, filled with 1,000 Jews from Hamburg, pulled into Minsk in Nazi-occupied Russia. Shortly afterward, 17,000 German Jews were deported to the Lodz ghetto in Poland.

Subsequently, Jews from Munich, Nuremberg, Stuttgart, Wurzburg, Furth and smaller towns were deported to the Lithuanian and Latvian cities of Kovno and Riga.

The first deportation of Berlin Jews directly to Auschwitz occurred on Jan. 12, 1943, a month before the surrender of German forces in Stalingrad.

Three of the most prominent members of the community – Rabbi Leo Baeck, Dr. Paul Eppstein and Philip Kusover – were deported to Theresienstadt in the same month.

One of the last deportations took place on April 20, 1943, when 150 youngsters were sent to Auschwitz. They had been living on a farm in preparation for immigration to Palestine, a British Mandate.

Germans who tried to help Jews imperilled themselves. Emmy Erdman, a resident of Trier, gave her identity card to a Jewish friend, who survived the war. Erdman herself was executed.

Such were the tragedies unleashed by Kristallnacht.

Women work for release of missing soldiers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Helen Cohen and Renanah Goldhar first met when Cohen saw Goldhar standing in the pouring rain collecting signatures for a petition to return the bodies of missing Israeli soldiers.

"I felt badly for her, and I had to introduce myself. She felt so strongly about the issue," says Cohen.

They joined forces and eventually formed the organization Mothers for MIAs, an "informal" group – they are its only two members – that does what it can to spread the word about the soldiers.

Their inspiration, they say, is Chaim Avraham, father of Benny, one of three soldiers kidnapped and murdered by Hezbollah in October 2000, who they heard speak in Toronto after his son was abducted.

"I can't imagine the fortitude it takes for him to speak out [on his son's behalf and on behalf of all the missing soldiers,]" says Cohen.

"He wanted support in putting pressure on the government, and we really hear him."

In 2001, the pair collected about 10,000 signatures and submitted the petition to Ottawa. "That was all without a formal meeting," Goldhar says.

The petition was on behalf of eight soldiers declared missing in action in or around Lebanon since 1982.

Another petition acknowledges the one from 2001, and thanks the government, along with other governments and international humanitarian organizations, for all of their efforts on the soldiers' behalf, resulting in the return of the remains of three of the MIAs – Omar Souwad, Benny Avraham and Adi Avitan – to their families for proper burial in January 2004.

This petition demands that the status of the five remaining MIAs be ascertained: Yehuda Katz, Tzvi Feldman and Zachary Baumel, all missing since 1982; Ron Arad, missing since 1986; and Guy Hever, missing since 1997

Cohen and Goldhar are also collecting signatures for the return of the remains of Eli Cohen, who was tortured, tried, and convicted as a Mossad agent by the Syrian government, and then hanged in 1965; and on behalf of Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, who were abducted this past summer.

The women are connected to Born to Freedom, an Israeli organization that is offering a $10 million reward for the return of missing Israeli soldiers.

"[Our support] means so much to them. They thought they were working in a vacuum," says Cohen.

Goldhar says that what is "absolutely crucial is that the [soldiers] who have been missing since before this summer come back right in front of our eyes.

"These were young boys who were out there for us. I shudder to contemplate the concept of turning away from our own children."

She adds: "Imagine a society that sacrifices its children for its own use without care for their welfare. We want to get the word out and get these guys back."

Working for the soldiers' return is a long and arduous process, Cohen says, "but we feel like we're helping. It's important for our children to see the work we're doing."

They're busy with it all the time, she says. "We've taken copies of petitions to stores on Bathurst Street and to Hebrew day schools. Before [the High Holy Days], we sent out packages to a number of synagogues. We now have to follow them up."

Last summer, she says, they sold rubber bracelets and sent the proceeds to Israel.

Goldhar would like to see an empty seat at every Sabbath and holiday table "to remind us of these boys. Picture a family table that has a sibling missing. If we don't get fully involved in an issue, our Jewish soul dies."

Cohen, who goes to Israel at least twice a year, says that when things go badly for Israel, they will go badly for Jews everywhere. "What we are doing, is practical and 'hearts-on.'

"We're doing so little in the scheme of things, but we're trying to be useful. We're keeping these people in mind," she says.

Redeeming prisoners is a higher mitzvah than keeping Shabbat, Goldhar says.

Rae launches Lawyers Without Rights exhibit

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Former Ontario premier Bob Rae kicked off the 26th annual Holocaust Education Week with a lecture about the way Nazis systematically used law to oppress Jews before World War II.

Holocaust Education Week

Hundreds of people gathered at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto last week to hear Rae's lecture titled The Holocaust: From Rule of Law to the Nightmare of Oppression and Back Again, which described what happened to the rule of law in Germany after 1933 and explained how that kind of discrimination led to the murder of more than six million Jews.

The Holocaust Education Week opening night program coincided with the Toronto opening of the exhibit called Lawyers Without Rights: The Fate of Jewish Lawyers in Germany after 1933, which was sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies and runs until Nov. 12 at Beth Tzedec.

Donning a kippah, Rae, a leadership candidate for the Liberal Party, took to the podium and began his lecture by sharing his story of travelling to Lithuania 16 years ago with his Jewish wife, Arlene, to find out about her mother's family, who were murdered during the war.

They learned from an elderly Lithuanian woman, who knew her mother's family, that after the Nazis occupied Lithuania in 1941, her family and the rest of the Jewish townspeople were rounded up and forced to march to a nearby town where they were executed.

"The anti-Semitism of the Nazis took what was a deep-based prejudice in Europe… and took it to a new and sickening height of murder, of order, and execution," Rae said.

Bob Rae

He said that the when the Nazis seized power in 1932, as many as half of the lawyers and doctors in Berlin were Jewish.

"The theory and then the brutal practice was that Germany had to protect itself from this so-called brutal takeover [by Jews]," Rae said.

"The Nazis began their policy of systematically defining, labelling and excluding Jews from [practising within their] professions. It is here that we confront the difference between what I call, the rule of law and the law of rules."

Rae described the purpose of the well-known Nuremberg laws, which were implemented to define who was a Jew, who was of mixed blood and what the consequences of these distinctions were.

"When we think of the rule of law, we think of the opposite of oppression. But instead, we had this law of rules in which the state was an instrument of oppression, the legal system was an instrument of oppression, and judges and lawyers became active participants in a tyranny that was unmatched in human history," Rae said.

"The implementation of these laws of incredible and excruciating detail and great cruelty, in order to work, required an elaborate structure. Jews were denied citizenship, they couldn't practise their profession, they lost property."

He said that by 1939, about half of Germany's Jewish population, about 250,000 people, fled the country empty-handed, with little money and with the hope that another country would grant them entry.

Canada, he added, was one of the many countries that notoriously turned Jewish refugees away.

By 1942, high-ranking Nazis and SS officials had participated in the Wannsee Conference to discuss the Final Solution – a euphemism for the plan to exterminate all Jews.

"Carrying out [the Final Solution] required an incredible line of laws, of decrees, of rules, of order, of structure, and of system. And yes, it required, not just a few, but thousands of willing executioners, officials, judges, policemen, soldiers, and prison guards, all operating under this weight of rules and systems and so-called law," Rae said.

Rae ended his speech by reminding his audience that the Holocaust was not the "last gasp of hatred in the world," by referring to the ongoing genocide in Darfur, and the fact that some world leaders freely spread lies and hate about Jews and Israel.

"At the risk of being even moderately political, I would only say this: there is no state in the Middle East that compares in terms of its commitment to constitutionalism and human rights, except for the State of Israel," he said.

"Israel is a country that is preoccupied with the question of the rule of law… No court has been more active in assessing the conduct of its public officials than the Supreme Court of Israel."

We're fighting a spiritual battle

By RABBI MOISHE NEW

Freedom. Suddenly, a term so passé, a way of life so taken for granted, is back in the headlines.

We, in the "free world," had for decades stood at the sidelines of history and watched it unfold elsewhere. Now we are back in the thick of it, and Israel and the Jew are at the vortex of it all. The war is on, the world is the battlefield, and the sides have been drawn – terror and tyranny versus freedom.

This new, yet ancient, confrontation compels us to re-examine the origin and meaning of freedom.

History's first emancipation was the liberation of the Jews from Egyptian slavery. And it's the Bible that introduced to the world the revolutionary values of individual human rights and equality. The biblical notion of freedom is what inspired the American and British revolutions and thus became the bedrock for the world's strongest free and democratic societies.

Yet, freedom and democracy, per se, do not assure a just and benevolent society. The democratic elections in Gaza are ample proof of that. And, if one requires more examples from history, the election of Hitler to power through the democratic process should suffice.

When God first revealed Himself to Moses and charged him with a mission to bring the Jews out of Egypt, He made it clear that the Exodus is not an end in itself. Rather, the purpose of the Exodus was to arrive at Sinai and "serve Me on that mountain."

In other words, physical liberation from bondage does not mean freedom.

For, inevitably, the emancipation from physical slavery will give way to bondages and abuses of another kind – slavery to one's own weaknesses and self-serving agendas, which quickly become justified and then necessary. The consequences are not only self-destructive, but are certain to wreak havoc on others.

True freedom, then, is achieved through the transcendence of the very self.

But how can this possibly be achieved?

The answer, of course, is through allegiance to Him. Belief in, and commitment to a transcendent code of values and morality ensure that they remain immutable.

This global struggle that, whether we like it or not, revolves around the Jew and the State of Israel, will not be won on political grounds or by military might alone. The fact is that Islam is rooted in Judaism – in the Torah. Torah then, is the only place where the distortion and corruption of Islam can be addressed. We are engaged in a spiritual battle, with devastating physical consequences, and it's in the realm of the spirit that the battle will be won. It's high time that Jewish leadership understood this.

The Torah is the Torah of Truth. Its uncompromised message is universal and eternal.

The world just needs to hear it. And they need to hear it from us. In the end, truth must triumph.

For God's sake, for our sake, for the world's sake, let's give it a chance.

Rabbi Moishe New is at the Montreal Torah Center Bais Menachem Chabad Lubavitch.

Discipline: finding the right balance

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

A group of psychologists once devised an experiment where they built a house that was as proportional for adults as an average house is for little children. Ceilings were 40 feet high, doorknobs were almost out of reach, tables and chairs were huge. They placed several adults of normal emotional stability into the house, and within days, they began exhibiting neurotic symptoms.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

In commenting on this experiment, Rabbi Abraham Twerski, who is a psychiatrist and an eminent interpreter of the Torah's teachings on self-control and self-improvement, notes the following: "It is reasonable to assume that a small child feels completely overwhelmed in this world built for giants. The anxiety of existing in this humongous world would be intolerable, except for the trusted intermediates who would provide a bridge between the Liliputian child and the formidable environment... For a child to have a feeling of security, he must see these protective adults as stable, fair, wise and predictable."

In order to negotiate the world, children require both freedom and limitations, nurturing and discipline, spontaneity and order. These seeming pairs of opposites are in fact complementary. The rhetoric of contemporary life dictates that one feed children with endless encouragement, lest they suffer from low self-esteem. In principle, there is merit to always stressing the positive in a child's efforts, but there is a tricky balance, especially in education, between endless approval and the need to tell a student when they are not succeeding and where the source of their difficulties lies.

Feeling valuable is a basic human need, so when we discipline children or demand more out of them, style is as important as substance. Done angrily, it conveys harsh judgment. Done with faith and quiet hopefulness, it communicates one's belief in the children's competence and fosters their own self-belief.

Rabbi Twerski mentions often that when his father wanted to stress to him that a particular behaviour needed to be changed, he would reproach him with the telling Yiddish phrase "es passt nicht" – it's not worthy of you, it's beneath you. In fostering this kind of self-respect, we allow children and students to become their own moral and intellectual monitors. No longer must we continuously enforce a kind of external "policing"; the child has already incorporated an internal yardstick of dignity and worth.

The world, like a house out of proportion, can be a scary place. To allow children to feel comfortable situated in such a house requires both positive reinforcement and boundary setting.

There is a lot of discussion about self-esteem in current psychological and educational journals. Often, the preponderance of examples in such literature where the emphasis is on encouragement has been misinterpreted to mean that authority figures should never reproach kids. But nothing could be further from the truth. When children repeat a negative behaviour and we do not confront them with it, we imply that we do not believe them capable of better, the ultimate death blow to their self-esteem.

Stossel's book agitates, stimulates

Myths, Lies, and Downright Stupidity* by John Stossel, Hyperion Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

On the popular 20/20 television show, John Stossel serves as consumer advocate and investigative reporter. In a manner both humorous and angry, he demolishes widely held myths, debunks popular misconceptions and attacks "plain old stupidity." He shows why conventional wisdom – economic, medical, political and social – is often wrong and sometimes even dangerous to our health and an affront to our pocketbooks.

In his new book, the author challenges the reader with a battery of questions: is the world too crowded? Are we drowning in garbage? Do sweatshops exploit people? Is the media unbiased? Are our schools helping or hurting our kids? Do we have less free time that we used to? Is outsourcing bad for American workers? Does more money make people happier? Do political leaders promote the general welfare? Does washing with antibacterial soap keep you healthy? Is global warming a real problem?

In short informative paragraphs, Stossel indicates that reading in low light doesn't hurt your eyes, that mouthwashes don't cure bad breath, that being cold doesn't give you a cold, that eating at home isn't safer than eating out, that children are not necessarily good for marriage and that money may buy happiness, but not for long. He is convinced that tap water is just as pure and good for you as bottled water that costs 500 times more.

Some of the author's assertions, especially in the areas of economics, politics and the environment seem glib and questionable. For example, his conclusion that a higher minimum wage helps some workers "but hurts more." Or his blanket statement that most American businesspeople don't care about free markets and will stifle competition if it serves their needs.

Stossel is angry about how we view DDT. He writes, "Malaria will kill more than 1,000 children before you finish reading this book. The chemical DDT is at the core of the problem – not the use of DDT, but the failure to use it because of media hysteria. In Uganda alone said the minister of health, 'We are losing between two million and three million people a year.' Think of it: millions die because the media gets it wrong."

DDT, concludes Stossel, is capable of doing far more good than harm. "We just don't know that because many influential persons, including reporters, are terrified of the truth."

The author's attitude about global warming is surprising and unexpected. He suggests, "First, calm down. Second, if the world is warming, it is much more reasonable to adjust to it, rather than try to stop it: if sea levels rise, we can build dykes and move back from the coasts. It worked for Holland. Farmers can plant different crops or move north.

"Far better to keep studying global warming, let the science develop, and adjust to it if it happens, rather than wreck life as we know it by trying to stop it."

Finally, is there a connection between religious belief and individual well-being? Stossel indicates that belief in God correlates with happiness. According to a Gallup survey, the closer people feel to God, the better they feel about themselves and other people. One of the most comprehensive social surveys found that more than 48 per cent of adults who are both married and weekly churchgoers reported that they are very happy, compared to just 20 per cent of unmarried adults who don't attend church.

"Of course, going to church, temple or the mosque may also aid happiness because it leads you to spend more time with other people. That alone increases the odds of being happy," he writes.

This is the kind of book that you will want to discuss – or more likely argue about – with your friends. If it doesn't agitate or infuriate, it will certainly stimulate.

Jewish war veterans, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Nov. 11, we will pause to remember the men and women who have served their country and given their lives. This week and next I devote my columns to our Jewish veterans and to the Jewish soldiers who made the ultimate sacrifice.

The War Veterans of Canada site points out that "Canadian Jews have defended Canadian territory even before the Dominion of Canada existed. Aaron Hart served in Wolfe's army under General Amherst in 1759… Sir Alexander Shoenberg captained the ship that brought reinforcements to Quebec City for the battle of the Plains of Abraham in the same year." [www.yorku.ca/cjv/]

Almost 17,000 Canadian Jews volunteered for service in World War II, with 420 killed, died, or missing and presumed dead. The site states that an additional 2,000 Jews enlisted but "did not declare their Jewish identity in order to avert danger if captured by the Nazi force."

The Toronto-based Jewish Canadian Military Museum maintains a website that has video clips of Canadian veterans. Also available online are scanned historical documents, including extensive biographies of Jewish soldiers who were killed in the war. [http://jcmm.ca/]

Pte. Louis Goldin of Montreal joined Les Fusiliers Mont-Royal and was killed in action in Dieppe on Aug. 19, 1942, at the age of 24. His commanding officer, Capt. Antoine Masson, reported "that Pte. Goldin remained at his machine-gun post to the very last, in the face of the heavy Nazi attack." Pte. Goldin is buried at the Canadian Military Cemetery at Hautot-sur-Mer, France. [www.jcmm.ca/books/book1.pdf] (Please note that this is a large file.)

Pte. Goldin and his comrades will be honoured by the first memorial to Canada Jewish war veterans. [www.yorku.ca/cjv/memorial.html] The Flames of Memory will be created by architect Daniel Libeskind and will be located in Earl Bales Park in north Toronto. The architect describes it as "a sweeping, angled structure crenellated by eight candles, alluding to a Chanukah menorah." [http://tinyurl.com/ybdcet]

In the United States, it was Asher Levy, one of the original 23 Jewish settlers of New Amsterdam, who demanded the right for Jews to stand guard at the Jewish stockade. In 1896, a group of Jewish Civil War veterans organized the Hebrew Union Veterans, now known as the Jewish War Veterans of the U.S.A. The site mentions that there have been persistent accusations – then and now – that Jews have not served in the U.S. armed forces. In reality, "a study of Jewish participation in the military during World War II clearly indicates Jews served in the armed forces beyond their numerical proportion to the general population." [www.jwv.org/]

Seventeen Jews have been identified as recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor, America's highest recognition for bravery in combat. They have fought in the Civil War, the Indian wars, the Haitian Campaign, the world wars and Vietnam. On Feb. 24, 1969, Airman 1st Class John Levitow was aboard an AC-47 aircraft that was seriously damaged by a mortar round. The explosion ripped thousand of holes in the fuselage and caused an activated flare to roll loose in the cargo area. Despite his injuries, Levitow "threw himself bodily upon the burning flare… he dragged himself… to the rear of the aircraft and hurled the flare through the open cargo door… At that instant, the flare separated and ignited in the air, but clear of the aircraft." [http://tinyurl.com/lgnxp]

There are a number of other sites for Jewish American veterans [http://tinyurl.com/yavavt] as well as the National Museum of American Jewish Military History in Washington, D.C., [http://tinyurl.com/ydbloq] and a salute to Jewish military chaplains. [www.nmajmh.org/]

Anyone who has ever visited Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia will be struck by the many rows of graves, marked by crosses or the occasional Star of David. Many of those Jewish graves were identified by Ken Poch, who spent 15 years collecting the names of 2,700 Jewish military services members interred at Arlington. Poch, a Vietnam veteran who died in 2003, is buried at Arlington. [http://tinyurl.com/yg2n4z]

Children of survivors revealed as diverse group

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A review of psychological literature reveals that children of Holocaust survivors have conflicting experiences, says an associate professor at Wurzweiler School of Social Work, Yeshiva University.

Susan Bendor, a child survivor and daughter of survivors, was speaking at last week's conference for adult children of Holocaust survivors and their partners, Inheriting the Past and Influencing the Future, held at the Baycrest Wagman Centre.

In the opening talk of the conference, Bendor said that some research indicates that all second-generation survivors are marred psychologically by the experience.

"This, however, has not been found to be true. [Most] researchers have not arrived at findings that can generalize this diverse group."

Themes of overprotection and distrust have been well documented, she said, but an increased compassion for human suffering has also been identified.

"Along with the parental transmission of trauma, comes the transmission of coping skills, strength and resolve, and the improvisational skills to solve problems in the face of adversity," she said.

What some second-generation survivors interpret as uncaring "is actually a conscious decision on the part of the parents to [insist that their children] take charge of a situation, solve problems themselves, and cope with tough times."

Bendor said that Holocaust therapist Eva Fogelman identified two major groups of second-generation survivors. "Some are dysfunctional, and blame what is wrong with them on their parents' tragedy and on the Holocaust.

"The other group uses the Holocaust as the impetus for making the world a better place."

Susan Bendor and Susan Jackson

The names attached to the children of Holocaust survivors are troubling, Bendor said. "They have been called 'children of the Holocaust' and 'children of the nightmare,' but nowhere are they called 'children who are activists or fighters.'

"[Some of these children] have used the legacy of their parents' losses to become Holocaust educators. They have made a commitment to bear their parents' burdens and celebrate their parents' lives."

In the book Memorial Candles, psychologist Dina Wardi describes the children of Holocaust survivors as "memorial candles or replacement children," said Bendor.

"As the memorial candles, she sees their function as filling the void in their parents' lives. This, however, does not jive with my experience as a child of survivors.

"I have been to many homes of mourning, but I have also been to homes that played beautiful music. As a second generation, I have had a range of experiences."

Although Wardi acknowledges that some second generation survivors are enormously successful, said Bendor, "she describes them tentatively as if their success is temporary."

We can speculate why second-generation survivors cope with trauma differently, said Bendor, "but the variables are so many, it is impossible to come up with a credible answer."

One variable, she said, could be the experience of the parents. "Parents who had the hardest time coping were those who were passive [during the war.]

"Those who fought back are the ones who cope the best. My parents came up with one escape plan after another, and hoarded insulin for my diabetic brother."

Citing psychologist Aaron Beck, Bendor said that cognitive therapy rests on the postulation that thought precedes behaviour.

"It is not the situation that determines how you behave, but it is your perception of the events. When we were liberated, we discovered that our apartment was rubble. My grandmother said that we had to start over, and we would start with the kitchen because we had to eat.

"We sensed some hope from my grandmother, and through [that hope] my brother and I learned to cope."

Bendor said, however, that children can overcome troubled families. "A study on the children of alcoholics found that many children did not develop the pathology of alcholism.

"People of all ages have the capability to change, to learn and to grow."

Bnei Akiva courses give students head start on university

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Bnei Akiva high schools – Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim – have launched a pilot program to offer their Grade 12 students advanced placement (AP) courses in English literature and calculus this year.

The courses, which are held after regular class hours as an extra-curricular subject, are "designed to emulate the level of a first-year university course for students still in high school," said Frank Samuels, principal of the schools, which serve 140 boys at Or Chaim and 140 girls at Ulpana.

Most Canadian universities offer a transfer credit – which may or may not be considered a prerequisite for a second-year course – and/or advanced standing, enabling students to go straight into a second-year course, to those who have achieved a high enough mark on a standardized three-hour AP examination, said Lynda Robinson, associate director of AP Canada (www.ap.ca).

The courses cannot replace high school courses, she noted, but in some schools, if enrolment permits, the curriculum material is combined with that of the regular Grade 12 course to meet the requirements of both.

The New York-based organization, the College Board, which was founded in 1955 to create the AP program, sets the AP content, as well as content for the pre-university SAT exams.

For Bnei Akiva students in particular, the AP courses offer a distinct bonus. Most of the students spend a year in yeshiva or seminary in Israel before commencing their university education, said Samuels. "In theory they're a year behind when they come back."

For any students who take AP courses and succeed at the exam, "it gives them a lot more flexibility in university," allowing them to do things like take a semester off and work in an underdeveloped country, said Robinson.

But even if students don't receive a mark that will allow them to obtain credit from a university, they finish the course "so much better prepared" and learn to "think like a university student," said Samuels.

However, the main reason the school is offering the courses, Samuels said, is "to stretch our top candidates [by giving them] an objective benchmark against which they can measure their ability." However, he added, the AP courses are open to any students who are interested.

There may also be a cost-saving element if students are successful in the course, he noted. Although Ulpana and Or Chaim charge a fee for the course, which includes the $83 (US) exam cost, the university course that may not have to be taken will cost more, he said.

Bnei Akiva is now among about 60 public, Catholic and private schools in Toronto – and another 30 in the surrounding area – that offer AP courses. The courses have been offered in Canada since 1990, and are also offered in 109 other countries. Two other Canadian Jewish high schools also offer the courses, one in Vancouver and one in Winnipeg.

Ulpana and Or Chaim offer the courses one afternoon a week. About eight students (six boys and two girls) are in the English courses, which are taught by a staff member, and about half a dozen boys are in the calculus course, taught by a teacher from outside the school.

Drive to end child poverty is behind schedule: MP

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Seventeen years after the launch of a national campaign to end child poverty in Canada by 2000, one in six Canadian kids still lives in poverty, says MP Olivia Chow.

Speaking Oct. 29 to the board of directors of National Council of Jewish Women Canada about Campaign 2000, Chow, the MP for Trinity-Spadina, said that in November 1989, Ed Broadbent, then leader of the NDP, tabled a resolution in the House of Commons that aimed "'to achieve the goals of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.'

"That resolution won unanimous support from every member of Parliament in every party. That was 17 years ago, and what do we have to show for it? We are almost seven years past the year 2000 target date."

Not one of the five federal governments that have been elected since has ever overturned that resolution, she said, but "they have failed utterly – a national failure that should go to the heart of every Canadian."

This failure, she said, is because every one of those Liberal and Conservative governments failed to take action to end poverty.

"The Liberals cancelled the national housing program… they introduced crushing fees on refugees and immigrants… and neglected child care for 13 years, until the very end of their mandate," Chow said.

"[Prime Minister] Stephen Harper's bogus $1,200 child-care benefit is a case in point. He plans to trash child care funding in this coming budget year, April 2007, and Canadians will lose a big part of [the $1,200] when they pay their income tax in the spring."

Chow first entered politics 21 years ago as a school trustee, and "a lot of kids came to school hungry. I could see these kids couldn't learn when they had to listen to their stomachs. I worked with [current NDP leader and her husband] Jack Layton, who was chair of the board of health in Toronto, and we developed a policy and a program to address the hunger – to serve breakfasts in some schools."

A decade later, she was a city councillor, and the city's first child and youth advocate, "and child poverty and hunger was still a fact of life," she said.

"Today, 80,000 children participate in this breakfast program. [These] kids have a good nutritious meal to get them through the day. For the hungry, it helps, and I take some comfort in that."

Efforts such as these, and NCJW's focus on affordable housing are inspiring, said Chow, "but they underscore the need for real partnerships with government.

"Without government action, we cannot achieve change that will put an end to poverty. Individual efforts may help relieve suffering, but we need more. It is not changing the cold, hard reality that causes the suffering," she said.

What we need, Chow said, is for the government to break the cycle of poverty by investing in child care and affordable housing.

"We need a decent minimum wage so working people can feed their kids," she said.

"Government could [also] go a long way to wiping out poverty by funding two simple and effective programs proposed by the NDP. The first is to bump the child tax credit to $4,900 from $3,400, and the other key priority is to fund national child care, something we could do for a fraction of the surplus," she said.

Achieving national child care is something that Chow said she has been working on for more than 20 years. "Since I was elected to Parliament this year, I have made it my priority."

She helped draft legislation, she said, for an Early Learning and Child-Care Act, "an act that enshrines the principles of universality, quality, accessibility and affordability, and I introduced the bill in the House of Commons."

It went to second reading last month, "and I am pleased to say that we achieved support form the Liberal child-care critic and the Bloc Québécois critic. It comes up for final reading [this month] and we have a chance to make history, to enshrine child care as a cornerstone of Canada, like national health care," she said.

Research shows that there is a direct link between child care and economic growth, Chow added. "More investment in child care, more productivity, more growth.

"Investing to reduce poverty is good for the economy. The war on poverty must be won, and if it is won, we will enjoy economic benefits as well as human benefits."

To raise awareness of what services and resources are available in our community – for those who are in need of help – and for those who would like to help.

THE NEED IS URGENT!

- A mother and her daughter share an old pair of winter boots.
- An elderly lady snowbound in her house for several days, doesn't know who to call for help.
- An immigrant who was promised a job before arriving is told, upon arrival, that there is no job.
- A child addicted to drugs roams the streets, with nowhere to go.

Hollywood elite sign anti-Hezbollah, Hamas ad

West Wing star troubled by lack of Jewish signatories

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

One of Hollywood's most enthusiastic supporters of Israel and a frequent keynote speaker at Jewish Federation events was among the signatories to a unique, pro-Israel ad in Variety magazine and other publications (to view the complete ad, look in this issue of the Canadian Jewish News).

On August 16, two days after a ceasefire was called in the battle between Hezbollah and Israel, 84 Hollywood, film, media and sports celebrities published a full-page statement in the Los Angeles Times, Hollywood Reporter and Variety denouncing Hamas and Hezbollah for the death of civilians in Lebanon and Israel.

One of those who signed the ad was actor Joshua Malina, who was in Toronto in September 2005 as the keynote speaker at UJA Federation's community launch of Campaign 2006.

"It was a no-brainer for me," says Malina, 41, who most recently appeared in NBC's hit television show, The West Wing. "I had not a moment's hesitation deciding to put my name to that ad. I liked that civilian losses in both Lebanon and Israel were acknowledged, and that blame for them was laid at the feet of Hamas and Hezbollah. I also liked that they were specifically referred to as 'terrorist organizations' at a time when we are often asked to view them as political institutions."

According to Malina, the ad was the brainchild of Ehud Danoch, the Israeli consul general for Southern California who worked hard at recruiting support from Hollywood personalities.

During the early days of the war with Hezbollah, Danoch reached out to Hollywood's Jewish community through information briefings and tours of the consulate.

"I think that was a very smart thing to do. There is always a crucial public relations element to these conflicts, and Israel tends to be on the losing side in that respect," says Malina.

While Malina says he was delighted to see that 83 other people in his business were willing to put their names to the ad, overall, he was disappointed.

"Short of a few people at my parents' shul commending me, there has been silence [about the ad]," he says. "There just doesn't seem to be a huge awareness or concern for Israel matters among the people I work with. I wonder why there weren't more names of Jewish people who appear before the camera. If you study the list, there are a lot of non-Jews, and a lot of Jewish agents, writers, directors and producers, and not so many actors. It's a wonder to me that, with the abundance of famous Jewish actors and actresses in this town, that more were not willing to sign. I think the relative silence of Hollywood's Jewish community towards Israel is a disgrace. At a time when heads of state blithely announce their intentions to destroy the Jewish State, silence is not a luxury that the Jewish American community can afford."

The ad reads as follows: "We the undersigned are pained and devastated by the civilian casualties in Israel and Lebanon caused by terrorist actions initiated by terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas. If we do not succeed in stopping terrorism around the world, chaos will rule and innocent people will continue to die. We need to support democratic societies and stop terrorism at all costs."

Other signatories to the ad included Michael Douglas, Nicole Kidman, William Hurt, Danny De Vito, Bruce Willis and former Torontonian, producer Ivan Reitman.

Media watchdog fights for fair coverage of Israel

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

If you've ever griped to friends about the media's anti-Israel slant, or moaned to coworkers about a biased TV report, Dov Smith wants you.

"There's a tendency for people to watch the news, see something about Israel they don't like, and complain to their friends and family," says Smith. "People need to actually take that next step and instead of complaining to their friends, complain to the people producing the news. That can make a big difference."

Dov Smith

Smith ought to know. As the executive director of HonestReporting Canada, he has been fighting for fair and accurate coverage of Israel in the Canadian media since the group's 2003 inception.

HonestReporting Canada is an independent, non-profit organization with the same brand and objectives as its American counterpart—honestreporting.com.

While it took time to make inroads, the group is now in a position to meet with major media organizations. "We built credibility by operating in a way that showed them we're a reasonable, moderate group of individuals who are interested in fair and accurate reporting," says Smith.

The media watchdog has a number of approaches to correcting biased reporting. If a complaint is launched by one of their 13,000 subscribers, the staff will often assist them in writing letters and launching a complaint. At other times, HonestReporting Canada will work quietly to educate the media outlet.

That isn't to say there isn't a time to raise a ruckus. When HonestReporting Canada feels that it needs to, it can call on the full strength of its 13,000 subscribers across the country.

"There was a piece that the CBC did recently from Lebanon," says Smith. "They profiled the family of a fellow who butchered a father and daughter on the beach in the late '70s. The CBC portrayal was very sympathetic. They didn't even interview the one remaining member of the Israeli family. We thought this was grossly unfair, and we thought this was an instance where it was appropriate to make a fuss."

Twelve days later, the CBC had a report from Israel focusing on the Israeli side of the story.

"We view Israel's challenges as being dual," says Smith. "Israel is continually fighting physical battles but, at the same time, another war going on which is equally important—the war of images. And this is largely played out through the media."

"Our mission is to ensure fair and accurate coverage of Israel in the Canadian media," he says. "We are comfortable making the media uncomfortable about bad coverage."

Campus Report

Hillel reaches out to new campuses

Campus Report is a new feature of Jewish Toronto designed to keep readers up to date about the ongoing campus initiatives of Hillel of Greater Toronto, which is supported by UJA Federation.

Hillel of Greater Toronto is reaching out beyond its traditional campus locations to the emerging campuses at University of Toronto, Mississauga (UTM), University of Toronto, Scarborough (UTSC), Ryerson University, Humber College, Seneca College and George Brown College.

In order to support expanded programming, Hillel, with financial support from UJA Federation, recently hired two new professionals – Rachel Saslove, the Emerging Campuses Program coordinator at Seneca College and Ryerson University, and Talya Sive, who holds a similar position at UTM, Humber College and George Brown College.

A UJA Federation grant is helping with programming and engagement both on and off campus, to give students at smaller campuses an increased sense of belonging to the Jewish community.

"Before I felt I was alone and different than everyone else on campus. Now I have found Hillel here and I feel as though I belong to something bigger," said Ariela Shvartsman, a first year student at UTM.

Currently, more than 20 Jewish students are signed up with Hillel at George Brown and Humber Colleges, UTM and UTSC, with numbers growing weekly. Ryerson distributes 400 e-mails weekly to Jewish students.

The two Emerging Campuses Program coordinators focus on engaging Jewish students previously uninvolved in Jewish life and creating programs or events that appeal to their specific areas of interest. This is somewhat easier on smaller campuses where students search for a sense of community.

"A Jewish group on campus is a home away from home; meeting people with similar values in a friendly environment, in what sometimes can be a hostile setting," says Jonathan Cohen, a student at George Brown's Casa Loma campus.

Following a recent study carried out by Hillel, it became evident that Jewish students on smaller campuses had different priorities and involvement levels than those at larger campuses. Many Jewish students on smaller campuses welcome the idea of interfaith groups and Hillel has been involved with such initiatives. The upcoming Holocaust and Genocide Awareness Day at UTM partners with the African Students Association, among others, to encourage dialogue and discussion. The Emerging Campuses initiative is an exciting enterprise, demonstrating Hillel's ability to adapt to the changing needs of its diverse student community across the GTA," says Sive.

Psychological effects of war still evident in Israel

Business leaders join UJA Federation mission to the north

Northern Israel is still recovering psychologically from this summer's war with Hezbollah. That's the assessment of nine business leaders on a recent UJA Federation fact-finding mission to northern Israel, chaired by Dan Daviau, Jeff Rosenthal and Henry Wolfond.

"Visiting the northern part of Israel in the wake of this summer's conflict certainly heightened our awareness of Israel's vulnerability to the hostile forces surrounding it," said Wolfond. "Beyond seeing first-hand the destruction of homes, schools and institutions, what had a profound effect on me was the impact on the psyches of northern residents. One woman told us about a child's birthday party that took place after the war, where a balloon popped and all the kids froze. The story shows how the fear is carried with them; it explains the need for more services, psychological counseling, and training for teachers to recognize and deal with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. It really drove home the need to do whatever we can to support these people."

"The physical damage may not be as apparent as it was immediately following the war," says UJA Federation annual campaign director Jeff Springer, who accompanied the delegation on the trip, "but the psychological, social, and economic damage is clear."

Highlights of the mission included a briefing from Miri Eisen, spokesperson for Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert; a visit with Ethiopian immigrants at the Kiryat Yam Absorption Centre which was damaged by Katyusha rockets; a session with Kobi Katz, mayor of Metullah, the northern-most city in Israel; and a meeting with Dr. Naftali Halberstadt, director of Trauma Response Programs for the Joint Distribution Committee-Israel who introduced the group to initiatives in the north which are helping children overcome the traumatic effects of the war this past summer.

Some of those initiatives are being supported by the UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, which has already raised $70 million with $19 million designated for Israel's emergency needs.

The next phase of the campaign, Project Northern Recovery, will be funding urgent initiatives to help northern Israel get back on its feet again. Among them are trauma counseling, a re-invigorated fund for victims of terror, small business loans and student scholarships.

Former Viennese champion diver recalls life under Hitler

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

Greta Stanton's appearance in the acclaimed film Watermarks was a turning point for her. The movie charts the story of seven women swimmers from the legendary Viennese Jewish sports club Hakoah, formed when Austrian sports clubs were closed to Jews in 1909. Hakoah went on to become one of Europe's biggest athletic clubs until the Nazis shut it down in 1938.

Stanton was a former teenage diving champion with Hakoah and her return to Vienna with the crew and cast marked the first time she allowed herself to "remember the good times I had when I was young in Vienna," she said.

In an interview with Jewish Toronto, Stanton recalled spending her youth at Stadionbad, an outdoor swimming pool in Vienna. She remembered reading stories and singing songs with her friends. Her best recollection is winning a double victory at the youth diving championships in 1937.

But these memories were clouded for many years by other, darker ones: supporting her family for a-year-and-a-half under Hitler while her father, a lawyer, could not work; risking arrest to go boating with friends; witnessing Kristallnacht, the "night of broken glass" when Jewish homes, stores, and synagogues were ransacked and set on fire; fleeing for America as the war broke out, not knowing if she would ever see her parents again (they escaped a year later, two days before their scheduled deportation).

Greta Stanton

Stanton's return to Vienna with Watermarks director Yaron Zilberman and former Hakoah teammates, was the first time the good memories outshone the bad.

"I had been to Vienna a few times before, under duress, and I left after two or three days," she said. "But this time, the visit to the old pool and the reminiscences and seeing friends who I hadn't seen for many years – it was a very positive experience. It was the first time I could not dwell too much on the Hitler experience."

Whether in the front or back of her mind, that experience is always with her. Stanton recalled her response to hearing about the attack on the Twin Towers in New York City. "When 9/11 happened, I was the only person who acted as though this is a normal thing to happen and I didn't break down and I didn't run for the phone, and I think that's a survivor instinct. You live day to day."

A former professor of social work and a graduate of Yad Vashem's course for international educators, Stanton has been teaching students about the Holocaust since her retirement from academia 17 years ago.

"Survivor testimony is absolutely essential," she explained. "I have seen survivors who are the worst speakers in the world come across better than some wonderful speakers who don't have it in their hearts. A picture is worth a thousand words, and it's absolutely true. The students respond to the personal experience."

Stanton believes the film's success is due in part to its focus on what she calls "the ordinary experience," referring to city life under Hitler. "I think some of the acclaim of the movie is that more than 60 years after the event, the ordinary experience is interesting and not only the camp experience. And the political events in my opinion are rather parallel to some of the things that we're experiencing now."

Greta Stanton will recall her memories of Hakoah and life under Hitler, while discussing the personal impact of Watermarks at "We Remember and Honour," the closing program of Holocaust Education Week. The event will take place Thursday night, November 9 – the anniversary of Kristallnacht - at Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue (2 Simonston Blvd. 905-889-4975). Holocaust Education Week is sponsored by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

Women's Campaign & Advocacy surpasses $8 million for IEC

Under the leadership of LOJ Luncheon co-chairs Kachan and Maldoff, this year's LOJ event attracted over 300 women, up from 200 last year. Thanks to Lion co-chairs Cohen and Draper, WC&A has welcomed 95 new "lions" to the Division. So far, Women's Campaign & Advocacy has raised over $8 million for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007.

CORRECTION

In the volunteer supplement appearing in the October 26 edition of The Canadian Jewish News and coordinated by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, we inadvertently published an incorrect quote from Sheila Mostyn of National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto Section. Sheila is one of NCJW's volunteers of the year. Here is the correct quote: "Council's mandate, Study, Service and Social Action, has influenced my voluntarism. I hope the Passover Food Drive will continue to unite and mobilize the entire Jewish community to help all Jews celebrate Pesach with dignity."

Exhibit tells Baycrest's story

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Baycrest Foundation recently hosted Treasures of Baycrest, a special event to honour 78 men and women who have enhanced Baycrest and the lives of the elderly.

Through a gift from Baycrest supporter Joseph Gottdenker, chair of Baycrest Foundation's donor recognition committee, the first Treasures of Baycrest exhibit was initiated in 2004, to honour donors, volunteers, staff, friends and clients.

More than 500 family members and friends attended the Oct. 29 tribute at which 2006 honorees were feted. Their stories and framed photographs are exhibited on the ground floor at Baycrest, across from the Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum in the Silverman Garden Court. Treasures of Baycrest includes a monitor for viewing the exhibit electronically.

Participating in the tribute were Ronald Appleby, chair of the Baycrest Foundation, Fran Sonshine, chair of Baycrest's board of directors, Pinchas Gutter, chair of the treasures of Baycrest merit committee, and Adam Gottdenker, who represented his father who was out of the country.

The Treasures of Baycrest exhibit tells the story of Baycrest, which dates back to the turn of the 20th century, through the 2006 honorees' stories and photographs. From the women volunteers of the Ezrath Nashim Society who collected money door to door to help the needy elderly, Baycrest has grown to a pre-eminent, world-recognized centre for the care of the elderly. It includes a chronic care facility, a leading research institute and several outpatients clinics.

"I have long considered Baycrest to be a jewel in the crown of our community," said Appleby.

"The men and women we pay tribute to in the Treasures of Baycrest exhibit are an amazing representation of the thousands of volunteers, staff members, friends, clients and donors who have made enormous contributions to Baycrest and to the health and well-being of our most prized citizens, our elderly."

BACK TO CAMP: Grade 6 students from Bialik Hebrew Day School took part in their annual retreat at Camp George recently. The rain held off and students enjoyed a full schedule of activities, including challah baking and a nature-themed art session, as well as learning camping and survival skills, and team-building. They also took part in a talent show and learned about issues related to Israel's recent war with Hezbollah.

$50,000 donation gives Guardian Angels new life

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Toronto chapter of the Guardian Angels, a non-profit anti-crime group, would have been forced to fold last week if not for a $50,000 donation made by an anonymous woman.

And after surviving its near-death experience, the group said it will use the money to open sub-chapters in communities outside central Toronto.

"We were pretty close to shutting down, and then we got an injection of funds, and we're actually now going the other way and doing a big expansion in communities throughout Southern Ontario," said the group's national director, Lou Hoffer, a former Toronto police officer and a ba'al tshuvah.

"Maybe people don't want to go into someone else's community, and that's why we've gone into stage 2 now. If people don't want to patrol Regent Park because they don't live in Regent Park, what we're doing with this injection of funds is saying OK, if you want to patrol in York Region, great. Mississauga? great," said Hoffer, who was named one of Toronto's 10 most influential people by Maclean's magazine last month.

He said that when he spoke to the anonymous donor, she said she gave the group money because "safe parks and streets must be a priority."

Hoffer acknowledges that the group hasn't received a warm welcome here.

"Toronto has been a tough nut to crack, and what's funny is that just south of the border, they realize the benefits of the Guardian Angels," he said, adding that New York Governor George Pataki granted the organization $200,000 last month to help it promote cyberangels.org, a website that deals with educating the public about Internet sexual predators.

"Meanwhile, [Toronto] Mayor David Miller and Police Chief [Bill Blair] won't even meet with us," Hoffer said.

The controversy surrounding the organization began last summer when opponents of the Guardian Angels – which was founded by Curtis Sliwa in New York City 27 years ago and has since expanded to 80 chapters worldwide – accused its volunteers of being vigilantes who threaten to cause more crime by provoking dangerous situations on the street and making citizen's arrests.

"I contacted Curtis Sliwa and I reached out to the Guardian Angels because of the rash of anti-Semitism three years ago in York Region and North York, when synagogues were being spray-painted with swastikas and Jewish headstones were being kicked over. I didn't want a vigilante organization," Hoffer said in response to the accusations.

He added that the group's volunteers – who wear its trademark red berets and jackets and are provided with CPR, first aid and self-defence training – have worked hard over the years to make streets safer by providing extra sets of eyes and ears.

Despite opposition to the organization here in Canada, Hoffer said there are about 100 volunteers in Toronto, and he recently returned from Ottawa to launch a new chapter there.

Although he said the Guardian Angels are expanding into communities from coast to coast, Hoffer thinks the reason the organization is having trouble staying afloat in this country is because Canadians are too apathetic.

"I think we have a problem here in Canada with apathy. Our organization has tried the stem the tide of apathy. People go home at night, run inside, lock the door, close the blinds and just have that attitude that it's someone else's problem. That is so against the Jewish way of thinking and that is why I'm so proud to be the catalyst that has brought the Guardian Angles here to Canada," Hoffer said.

While he expects that the launch of sub-chapters will help expand and stabilize the organization, Hoffer also plans to begin fundraising.

He said that the decision the organization made to refrain from asking for donations may have contributed to the reason it racked up a $50,000 debt in such a short period of time.

"What we should have done from a business point of view, from day one, we should have done fundraising. We should have come out and said we are a legal, licensed, non-profit organization," he said.

New facility to be called Prosserman JCC

The new JCC will be called the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, reflecting a major donation from Martin Prosserman – the founder of clothing manufacturer and retailer Moores the Suit People – and his family.

In response to concerns raised by BJCC members at the meeting, Kulman said that tennis courts will be available next summer and that the new facility would include one tennis court. There will be two indoor basketball courts and one outdoor one.

However, she said, no squash or racquetball courts are being planned at this time, because of their high cost and the low demand for them. She said planners would "take under advisement" a comment that one tennis court would not be enough.

Also, she noted, the current outdoor pool will be replaced by a larger one with a children's splashpad on the side.

Speakers at the meeting stressed that although plans have not been completely finalized, they felt it was important to begin communication at an early stage.

Among the items not yet decided is how to "recognize appropriately" facilities within the BJCC that are named for donors. "That's next on our agenda," said the federation's Robin Gofine.

One question concerned the lack of younger people at the meeting and how to attract younger members to the new centre. The questioner said programming geared to younger people could be started "now. We don't need fancy facilities to be able to do that."

Cohen agreed, and said one of the key aims of the fundraising campaign for the project is to establish a large number of endowments for programming.

Referring to the recent hiring of Lori Starr, formerly of the Skirball Cultural Centre, a major Jewish cultural centre in Los Angeles, he said her job is "to create innovative programming for the community, and that's why we hired her now."

Another pointed question concerned money that has been spent to improve the existing facility when plans to replace the building were already in the works.

Cohen said the renovations did not involve "huge money" and had been done "to keep membership happy in the interim.

"Unfortunately it has to be spent to keep the place going until we have money [for the new building]."

More than half the money has been raised for the Central Square project, and Cohen said he is "cautiously optimistic" that raising the rest "won't be a problem."

The new building will feature state-of-the-art equipment and "proper glazing so heating costs will be less," said Cohen.

Other elements of the project will include a new Koffler Centre of the Arts, as well as a new Leah Posluns Theatre, a new Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage, and a new Holocaust centre. The buildings will be interconnected by a walkway, said Cohen.

In addition to some outdoor parking, there will also be "quasi-underground" parking below the JCC building, which will be on a hill, he said. The current south parking lot will become a park.

The Tomorrow campaign is Canada's largest non-profit community development project, said federation chair David Engel.

"We're doing much more than building facilities. We're building programs and services, and most of all Jewish identity and Jewish pride," he said.

Among the reasons for replacing the 45-year-old building, board member Shel Geller said there are areas "that are not accessible and cannot easily be made accessible for people with disabilities."

Beth Tikvah's Rabbi Allen receives UTJ honour

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue will be honoured next week, together with his wife Patti, by the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ), a trans-denomational education and outreach organization that includes both Orthodox and Conservative rabbis.

The Chaver Ne'eman Award is being presented to the couple at UTJ's annual Journal Dinner on Nov. 15 in New Jersey.

The rabbi, who was ordained 29 years ago by the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) may have his "feet in different camps," as he puts it, given developments in the Conservative movement in recent years that have moved large segments of Conservative Judaism further from tradition. Many Conservative congregations in the United States are fully egalitarian, for example, although the majority in Toronto are not.

This December, the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards (the Rabbinical Assembly's authority on Halachah) will vote about the question of rabbinic ordination for gays and lesbians. It's likely that opposing tshuvot will be accepted as valid.

Rabbi Wayne Allen and his wife Patti

Rabbi Allen declined to discuss possible ramifications of the vote for more traditional elements of the movement at this point.

Reflecting on the evolution of his own religious philosophy, the rabbi said he thinks he has become more tolerant of other opinions. "The more we study, the more we find there are other opinions we thought were unconscionable and wrong, that upon careful study, have some justification."

One area that likely distinguishes him from most of his tradition-oriented colleagues is his formal involvement in Beth Tikvah's outreach to intermarried couples. He has participated in an invitation-only think tank on intermarriage run by the Conservative movement's Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, and has spoken to members of his synagogue's "Married Out, Not Opted Out" group for interfaith couples and parents of those who are intermarried or interdating.

"I don't think we're doing anything out of the ordinary," he said. "I think we've become more proactive. If you believe that every Jewish soul counts and you want to preserve the connection of every Jew with Judaism, we have to accept them for who they are despite the fact they have done things we would consider to be sinful – [to use] a theological term – or wrong."

Intermarriage, today, is not equivalent to choosing to abandon Judaism, he believes.

The rabbi downplayed his involvement in UTJ, saying others have done more than he has.

However, he is a former treasurer and current vice-president. He also serves on the UTJ's panel of halachic inquiry and edited two of its volumes of responsa. As well, he participated in some of the organization's founding meetings, but has not been as active recently, he said.

Patti Allen – a psychotherapist working on a master's degree at York University with a specialty in dreams – has led seminars for rabbis' wives at a number of conferences, the rabbi said, adding that an honour for the couple, not just the rabbi, "is a recognition that there is an important partnership at work." The Allens have four children.

The spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah for the past 20 years, Rabbi Allen also enjoys playing basketball, although he said the league he founded at the shul is currently "dormant."

Prior to moving to Toronto, he served congregations in Los Angeles, and prior to that, Staten Island. In Los Angeles, he taught at California State University and the University of Judaism, and was a regular guest on Dennis Prager's phone-in radio show. He also appeared on television programs as a representative of the Southern California Board of Rabbis.

More recently, he played a rabbi in a Canadian feature film that has not yet been released.

The 55-year-old rabbi, a native of New York who grew up in a non-observant home, was a pre-law student at New York University before going on to JTS.

"I don't think I ever grew up with the intention of becoming a rabbi," he said.

Rather, he said, his experiences at Jewish day school – the Solomon Schechter School of Queens, which he began in Grade 5 after transferring from an Orthodox day school – and, later, in university, cultivated "an intense desire to study, learn and grow."

Rabbi Allen, who has two master's degrees, is currently working on a PhD at York University.

War opened door for co-operation with Arabs: analyst

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The recent war in Lebanon has created an opportunity for Israeli co-operation with moderate Sunni Arab states, an American Middle East analyst believes.

David Makovsky, a member of the Council on Foreign Relations in New York and the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, suggested in a recent interview that Hezbollah's alliance with Iran has set off alarm bells in the Arab world.

In a conference call with North American Jewish journalists, he said that moderate Sunni Arab governments, such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, now share Israel's nervousness that Shiite Arab and Muslim groups and regimes, as represented by Hezbollah and Iran, are on the ascendancy.

> Hezbollah's alliance with Iran has set off alarm bells in the Arab world

Assessing the results of last summer's war in Lebanon, Makovsky said Israel emerged from it with "a profound sense of vulnerability."

Israel degraded Hezbollah's fighting ability, but Hezbollah hammered the Galilee with rockets until a ceasefire took effect in mid-August, said Makovsky, whose monograph on the war was published recently by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

In his estimation, round two of the conflict is not imminent. But if war should erupt again, the flashpoint will be the Lebanese-Syrian border area.

Makovsky said the onus is now on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) to enforce the arms embargo against Hezbollah.

After admitting that he miscalculated in goading Israel to war, Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, will likely act with greater restraint in the future, Makovsky said.

Nasrallah is still popular among Lebanese Shiites, but Sunnis, Druze and Christians in Lebanon feel that he sacrificed their interests for his own ends.

Hezbollah's military performance during the war may well encourage Hamas to be more aggressive toward Israel, Makovsky said.

But in the meantime, Palestinian support for Hamas has been dropping steadily.

He expressed doubt whether the Israeli army will try to reconquer the Gaza Strip in a bid to stop Palestinian militants from firing Qassam rockets at Israeli settlements.

"Gaza is one big urban sprawl, so it wouldn't be simple," he said, citing the major reason why Israel will not attempt to retake Gaza after giving it up in the summer of 2005 in a unilateral withdrawal.

Israel can't take a chance on Iran

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"Islam, Terror and the Second Nuclear Age," an 8,200-word essay by Noah Feldman in the New York Times Magazine (Oct. 29) is essential reading for anyone who wonders what might happen if Iran develops nuclear weapons.

A law professor at New York University, Feldman is fluent in Arabic and has written extensively on the Arab/Muslim world. Below are some of the key points in his article.

• The prospect of nuclear Iran worries not only Israel, which views it as an existential threat, but also others in the Middle East, he writes. "A nuclear attack on Israel would engulf the whole region. But that is not the only danger: Sunnis in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere fear that the Iranians might just use a nuclear bomb against them."

• "States – including North Korea – might sell [nuclear] bombs or give them to favoured proxy allies, the way Iran gave Hezbollah medium-range rockets that Hezbollah used this summer during its war with Israel."

• Since suicide bombers are more than willing to die for their cause, they are by definition immune to deterrence, such as the theory of mutually assured destruction that worked between the United States and Russia during the Cold War.

• While no Muslim state has "openly embraced" the logic of suicide bombing, "after 9/11, we can no longer treat the possibility as fanciful." Nuclear-armed Pakistan, under "rational dictator" General Pervez Musharraf, has acted responsibly. But what happens if Islamic extremists take over?

• There is an internal debate among Muslim scholars about whether jihad, which is a "pillar of Islam," allows for the murder of innocents, especially women and children, and whether it permits suicide bombings, since suicide is banned in the Qur'an. Some scholars justify suicide bombings as "martyr" missions: "Even among rather secular Muslims, it has become standard to refer to suicide bombers as martyrs." While noting that "Palestinian suicide bombing [has] become a widespread social norm," Feldman says this is an exception. However, his argument ignores the hundreds of Iraqi civilians killed in the past few years by fellow Muslim suicide bombers.

• Feldman poses the following rhetorical question: "If the Islamic laws of war are under revision, or at least the subject of intense debate, what does this mean for the question of the Islamic bomb?" His answer is not reassuring: "[T]he expanding religious sanction for violence once thought unacceptable opens the way for new kinds of violence to be introduced and seen as legitimate."

• There is much speculation about whether Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad would use a nuclear bomb in a first-strike attack. He is on record as being a firm believer in the return of the 12th imam, "whose appearance will usher in a golden age of justice and peace to be followed by the Day of Judgment." Feldman calls this an "apocalyptic, millennial" mindset "that might lead whole peoples, rather than just individuals, into suicidal behaviour."

• Some argue that Ahmadinejad and the mullahs running Iran might be pragmatists who see acquiring nuclear weapons "primarily to improve [Iran's] regional position and protect itself against regime change – not to annihilate Israel. According to this view, Iran's nuclear push reflects a drive to what is sometimes called national greatness and might more accurately be defined as the ability of a country to thumb its nose at the United States without fear of major repercussions."

(This is the gist of another influential article, "Defiant Iran," by Christopher de Bellaigue in the Nov. 2 issue of the the New York Review of Books. De Bellaigue argues that, noxious, anti-Jewish rhetoric aside, Ahmadinejad might be pushing a defiantly nationalist and not an apocalyptic, pan-Islamic agenda.).

However, virtually all Israeli analysts concur that Israel can't risk assuming Ahmadinejad's language and repeated threats against the Jewish state are only bombast. With a nuclear weapons program well underway, and given all the evidence of his extremist Islamic-ideological views, Ahmadinejad, along with his fellow travellers, must be viewed as an imminent threat, and not only to Israel. The dominant question is what should be done?

Near the conclusion of his article, Feldman himself asks whether "force, negotiation or some combination is the right path to keep Iran from going nuclear."

No one appears to have an answer.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Municipal elections 101

Guest Voice

By STEVEN SHULMAN

Municipal election day in Ontario is Monday, Nov. 13, and I have two predictions about it. Not everybody will vote, and those who don't vote will complain about actions taken by municipal politicians voted into office by others.

Many people don't think municipal elections need particular Jewish attention. Issues high on the list of discussion in our synagogues, community centres and homes, including support for Israel and funding for Jewish day schools, are not under the jurisdiction of municipal councils or school boards. However, I can tell you that from my seat as Ontario regional director and national general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, I see municipal representatives regularly taking action and making decisions of great importance to our community.

Among other things, they address issues including political support for Jewish community centre developments such as the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow projects; efforts to ensure adequate parking for Jewish schools; facilitation of public space for Israel emergency rallies; and supporting partnerships with social services agencies funded by federations.

Even if one has children or grandchildren in Jewish day schools, what happens in our public schools is of significance to the Jewish community.

School trustees review and make policy that ultimately filters down to what is taught in the classroom, shaping attitudes for future generations. School boards have been instrumental in ensuring the development of programs on Holocaust education and countering anti-Semitism and other forms of racism. In the past year, Ontario school boards have addressed many key issues, ranging from examining the age-appropriateness of a book about the Middle East that was promoted to primary school students, to renting unused board space to other schools, including Jewish day schools.

Although elected officials don't have direct decision-making power on federal policy issues such as Israel or on provincial issues such as school funding, mayors, councillors and trustees are opinion leaders whose statements on issues outside their jurisdiction can be of great importance. The actions of municipal officials also carry significant symbolic value. For example, at the rallies for Israel this summer, who among us wasn't checking to see if our municipal representatives took part?

The late Tip O'Neill, former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, once said that "all politics is local," and many of our politicians start out locally. Former prime minister Kim Campbell and former premier Mike Harris were once school trustees. Current MP's with municipal experience include Liberal MP Susan Kadis and federal NDP leader Jack Layton. Votes in municipal elections are often votes for leaders who will ultimately make decisions on issues of provincial, national and international importance.

Voting is merely a beginning. As the population of Ontario and Canada increases, Jews will comprise a dwindling proportion of the electorate. Candidates launching their careers at the municipal level will not forget those who ventured into the trenches to knock on doors, put up signs, and drive people to the polls. The effectiveness of groups such as Canadian Jewish Congress is directly tied to the level of democratic participation by community members.

If you are at least 18 years of age, a Canadian citizen, and someone who cares about the Jewish future of our province and country, you have a responsibility to inform yourself, vote and look at other ways to enhance the democratic process prior to and on election day.

Steven Shulman is Ontario regional director and national general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Sam Katz re-elected as Winnipeg mayor

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeggers went to the polls on Oct. 25, and as was widely predicted, Sam Katz was easily elected to his first full term as mayor.

Katz – who is Winnipeg's first Jewish mayor (although before 1971, when the city's suburban administrations were merged into one body, the suburbs of Tuxedo and West Kildonan both had Jewish mayors) – was first elected in June 2005 in a by-election called to fill the remainder of Glen Murray's term after he left the mayor's office for an unsuccessful run for Parliament.

Sam Katz

Born in Rehovot, Israel, to Holocaust survivors, Katz made a name for himself primarily in the fields of sports and entertainment.

In the latter, he was responsible for bringing many big-name acts to the city over the years. Eleven years ago, he realized his dream of bringing professional baseball to Winnipeg. As the owner of the Winnipeg Goldeyes of the independent Northern Baseball League, Katz had to fight City Hall to build his ballpark, which has become one of the best-attended and classiest ballparks in minor league baseball.

(He was also part owner of the short-lived Winnipeg Cyclones basketball team and was a partner in the Salisbury House Restaurant chain.)

As mayor, Katz has concentrated on bread-and-butter issues such as road repairs, mosquito control, snow clearing and policing. He made few promises during this recent campaign, emphasizing instead the same issues he focused on as mayor. He also did relatively little campaigning, as he had little serious opposition.

There were three other candidates running against the pro-business Katz. Marianne Cerilli, a former provincial NDP cabinet minister, and the little-known Kaj Hasselriis appealed to left-wing voters. Combined, they garnered about 60,000 votes to Katz's 104,000. Ron Pollock, who is also Jewish, was considered a fringe candidate and received less than 5,000 votes.

Katz had endorsed a number of city council candidates, including Brenda Leipsic, who he appointed deputy mayor late last week. Leipsic, who became Winnipeg's first Jewish city councillor in eight years (Sandy Hyman, who also represented River Heights, was defeated by Garth Steck in 1995), said that although she was flattered to have had Katz's support, she also had the endorsements of many other leading public figures from across the political spectrum.

Leipsic had built up an impressive track record over the years as a volunteer. She co-ordinated the first Winnipeg Children's Hospital's Teddy Bears Picnic and has volunteered her time to CancerCare Manitoba, the St. Boniface Hospital Research Foundation and the Sharon Home Capital Campaign. In May, she finished a four-year term as co-chair of the Winnipeg Humane Society's $13-million fundraising campaign for its new building.

In June, she organized the dinner for the Major Cities Summit, with former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani as the keynote speaker.

In politics, she served two terms as president of the provincial Conservative party and earlier was a campaign chair for a former NDP MLA and cabinet minister.

"My family and friends encouraged me to run for city council," she said. "Since August, I have knocked on 3,000 doors and worn out two pairs of shoes."

In defeating first-term councillor Donald Benham, she removed one of Katz's most strident critics on council.

Leipsic speaks very highly of Katz and said he's the man to lead the way in tackling the city's myriad problems. Her own priorities are much the same as the mayor's: public safety, infrastructure and community clubs. She would also like to see more green space.

As well, Leipsic wants councillors limited to two terms in office.

In north Winnipeg, realtor Claudia Sarbit was re-elected to the Seven Oaks School Board. Sarbit, currently Manitoba's only Jewish public school board trustee, has been a school trustee for more than 20 years.

Sarbit, a former teacher, said she's always been interested in education.

"I had a lot of ideas that I thought would be helpful," she said. "I have always believed in public service."

Shae Greenfield, however, fell short in his campaign for the school board. It was the University of Manitoba political science student's first run for office. He worked for a year in Ottawa as a legislative assistant to a member of Parliament.

"It was a good experience," the 23-year-old said of his run. "I felt since I am recently out of school that I might have something to contribute to the discussion."

He said he may run for office again at some point.

Survivors speak about wartime experiences

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — At the first meetings of the Holocaust Survivors Group, members were hesitant to speak about their wartime experiences but as time passed they opened up.

"Some of the people who wouldn't talk about their experiences before do talk about it now, and from a place of pride," says social worker Adeena Lungen, who organized the group with social workers Gloria Gray and Cheryl Corrin.

Founded nearly six years ago, the Holocaust Survivors Group is an Older Adult Service, Jewish Child and Family Services (JCFS) program.

"From the beginning," says Lungen, "we wanted to reach out to Holocaust survivors, to involve them in an organized, primarily social group. We started by having an open meeting for all Holocaust survivors, asking them to tell us what they are looking for at this stage of their lives.

"Many of the survivors now still feel 'different,' even though they have integrated into the Winnipeg Jewish community and are really successful. They feel their differentness, as survivors. So they wanted a place where they either wouldn't feel different or they would all feel different together – as they shared something that only they have been through."

Cheryl Hirsh Katz, supervisor of the JCFS' Older Adult Services, says the turnout for the first meeting of the survivors' group was much bigger than expected. "We thought maybe 20 people would show up, but 80 people attended.

"There are other seniors social programs out there, but survivors have told us that they don't feel as comfortable or that they fit in. So they said they wanted a group specifically for survivors."

Lungen says some survivors have "voiced old grievances about how when they first came here, in the 1940s and '50s, there were not a lot of programs for survivors – really when they would have needed it most.

"They were traumatized, had no money or English-language skills. They told us they wanted a social group where they could get help with pensions/restitutions, meet with other survivors, share stories, laugh, have entertainment, celebrate festivals together and have speakers. So the group now meets one or two times each week."

Meetings take place at the Gwen Sector [Creative Living Centre] because a lot of the survivors live in the north end where the centre is. "We provide the participants with a kosher hot meal, and transportation around the city to the meetings – especially in the winter when it is harder to get out," says Hirsh Katz.

"We have school groups spend time with the survivors. They get to know them and learn about the Holocaust years. As well, second- and third-generation people come out, meet the group participants, and they learn from each other."

When Yoram Hamizrachi, a hero in the 1982 Israel-Lebanon war and a specialist on the Middle East, spoke to the survivors; he told the group that he was "honoured to be in [their] presence, because [they] are the true heroes," says Lungen.

"I think this captured it, that we are in the presence of people who lived through a time in history that was awful, and they survived. They are strong and resilient. And so, they are finally seeing that this is how people look at them."

Winnipeg student to take part in international debate competition

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A Grade 12 student at Gray Academy of Jewish Education will represent Canada at the World Individual Debate and Public Speaking Championships in Cape Town, South Africa next March.

Shira Lerner, who has been debating for four years, qualified last month at national competitions, which were held at St. Andrew's College in Aurora, Ont.

She is the only Jewish participant on the six-member Canadian Team.

"Shira worked very hard on this," says Linda Martin, Gray Academy's debating teacher. "She came to my house frequently over the summer to practice."

The debating program was introduced at Gray Academy about two years ago, due largely to the efforts of businessman Raymond Kives whose son was a champion international high school debater at St. John's-Ravenscourt School, a non-Jewish private school.

Kives helped establish the Gray Academy Debating & Public Speaking Fund through The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

Under the direction of Martin, Gray students have quickly made a strong impact on the Canadian and international high school debating scene.

In the spring of 2005, then Grade 11 student Susan Schipper took part in the international competitions held in Cyprus.

She competed against high school debating champions from countries including the United States, the United Kingdom, South Africa, Israel, and Pakistan.

Schipper performed well consistently throughout the different types of debating competitions and was ranked seventh overall. Last March, she placed second in debate at the World Individual Public Speaking and Debate Championship, held at the Hotchkiss School in Lakeville, Connecticut.

In her Grade 11 year, Lerner did well enough to qualify as an alternate member of the team but didn't make it to Lakeville.

She is very excited, she says, to have qualified for Cape Town.

"I learned a lot from Mrs. Martin," she says.

She also praises Andrew Kaplan who is filling in for Martin as debating teacher over the fall while she recuperates from surgery.

At the most recent competition, Gray Academy was also represented by Grade 12 students Cara Katz and Michael Schwartz.

This month in Montreal, six Gray Academy students Jessica Donen, Michael Schwartz, Josh Morry, Jonathan Ripstein and brothers Sam and Josh Fineblit – will be in competition at McGill University in the high school tournament.

Josh Morry also qualified to debate in the Western Debating Seminar in Moose Jaw, Sask.

Martin says that the public speaking and debating course at the school focuses on teaching students how to deliver effective oral presentations, individually and as members of a team.

"They analyze topics, listen to others, and learn to refute arguments," Martin says.

"This course provides students with the opportunity to present prepared and impromptu speeches and to participate in parliamentary and cross-examination debates."

מה יהיה

באחד ממוספי סוף השבוע הישראליים ראיינו שני חתני נובל ישראליים-פרופ. צ'אנובר ואומן, ושניהם אמרו במילים נמרצות שאם ישראל תמשיך בדרכה הנוכחית-היא תגיע לאבדון ("לא נהיה" אמר צ'אנובר). לא פחות ולא יותר-אבדון. הדברים הפריעו לי בכמה רמות:

קודם כל יולות המילים-בישראל אבדו המילה המדוברת והכתובה את ערכן -הרבה ממה שנאמר הוא כל כך מוגזם, כל כך לית, כל כך דאוור -שאף אחד, כולל פרופסורים מלומדים, אינו יכול להגיד דברים מדוייקים- בסגנון של "אם לא תעצק או לא קשיבו לך".

וממילא אף אחד לא לוקח את הדברים כפשוטם. מה שהנשמיט כינו ישראל ברוך. במה שונים הפרופסורים מפנינה רוזנבלום שמדברת ברצינות תהומית על נושאים שאין לה בהם מושג? אתם פרופסורים, שבמאמריהם המדעיים הם שוקלים כל מילה ברצינות רבה -נוערים בקול גדול על החורבן. ממש ישעיהו השני וירמיהו השלישי.

הצדעה לסיימון וגרפינקל

ביום חמישי, ה-10 בנובמבר יתקיים במועדון "הבה נגילה" קונצרט מיוחד- שירי סיימון וגרפינקל עם סיפורים הקשורים בהיסטוריה המופלאה שלהם. האמנים, היישר מישראל, הם מוני ארנון-מנהיג להקת האחים האחיות, וחברו לארי פוגל, זמר ידוע של שירי עם אמריקאיים. בדרך כלל מגיעים אמנים מישראל לבצע שירים עבריים, ועל כן יוהי חוויה שונה ומיוחדת לשירים ולאמנים שהולכים איתנו כבר יותר מארבעים שנה. ההופעה "הצדעה לסיימון וגרפינקל" מוצגת בהצלחה גדולה בישראל. "ראיתי, התלהבתי והחלטתי שגם לנו בטורונטו מגיע להנות" אומר האמרגן והאמן מיקי לוין שטרח להביא את מוני ולארי לעירנו.

סיפורים קטנים אחרי הימים הנוראים

תודה לשמחה על שקידתנו. הינה שני סיפורים חמודים:

לקראת סוף תפילת יום כיפור שאל הרב: "מי מיכם סלח לאויבים שלו?". כולם הרימו את ידיהם חוץ מזקנה קטנה אחת.

"גברת כהן, התפלא הרב-אולי תגלי לנו מדוע איך יכולה לסלוח לאוייבייך?", "פשוט אין לי אויבים" ענתה הזקנה.

"גב. כהן, שאל אותה הרב, בת כמה את?"

"בת שמונים ושמונה," ענתה הזקנה,

"או אולי תגלי לנו איך הצלחת בגילך המופלג שלא יהיו לך אויבים?".

"פשוט-נתתי להם כולם למות" ענתה הזקנה בשלווה.

אשה נעימה ועדינה נכנסה לביתי מרקחת וביקשה מהרוקח ציאניד. השתומם הרוקח ושאל אותה למה היא צריכה את הרעל, והיא ענתה בעדינות שהיא מתכננת להרוג את בעלה. הודיעוץ הרוקח האחרי שנרגע אמר לה: "את מטורפת או מה? הרי יאשימו אותך ברצח ויאסרו גם אותי, תשכחי מזה!"

פתחה הגברת את ארנקה והוציאה מתוכו תמונה של בעלה בתחתונים שאיננה משתמעת לשתי פנים עם אשתו של הרוקח.

הביט הרוקח בתמונה ואמר: "טוב, היית צריכה להגיד מיד שיש לך מרשם"...

Lawyer regales veterans with Churchillian tales

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ronald Cohen's quarter-century fascination with Winston Churchill has culminated in the publication of a three-volume bibliography of Churchill's life.

On Oct. 29, the lawyer and film producer, whose personal Churchill collection includes more than 6,000 items, spoke at the annual meeting and brunch of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Ottawa post, held at Agudath Israel Synagogue.

"Churchill had a legendary wit and spun a great tale as many of you know," said Cohen. "There are those stories that were true and those that were not true. He was so good with a line that any good story was attributed to him."

Cohen emphasized, with numerous citations of fact, Churchill's admiration for, and defence of, Jews in Britain and his strong belief in Zionism.

"Despite pressures from many quarters, he defended the contributions that Jews had made to Great Britain and around the world," he said.

Cohen's presentation was scholarly, detailed and impassioned, concluding that "we won't see [Churchill's] like again."

Post commander Phil Pinkus thanked Cohen. "Many of us here today lived through very perilous times… what gave us a glimmer of hope was the magnificent voice of Churchill," he said.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who said his late father had been a great fan of Churchill, addressed the veterans and thanked them for their sacrifices. "We do not take for granted the great freedoms that we have. We have them because of you," he said.

Bringing greetings on behalf of the State of Israel, Ambassador Alan Baker noted that Jews have served in many wars. "Whilst you are veterans of the Second World War, there are other veterans of other wars… I am a veteran of two wars in Israel; Dahlia [his wife] is a veteran; and my three sons… are also veterans," he said, adding that there were also people present – Sara and Ze'ev Vered – who had fought with the Palmach, the pre-state Jewish militia in Palestine.

Scholarships were presented to four students, all recent high school graduates, who are pursuing post-secondary education.

Winners of the Ottawa Post Student Awards were Nathan Cepelinski and Emily Moon. The Abe Carlofsky Student Award was presented to Daniel Herscovitch, while Hillel Shaps was the winner of the Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Student Award.

Pope chooses Holocaust-inspired art for the Vatican

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Ronnie Cahana grew up with the smell of paint and his Hungarian-born mother's attempt through her art to express her feelings about the Holocaust and her miraculous survival of Auschwitz as a teenager.

He could never have imagined that one day his mother, Alice Lok Cahana, would be received at the Vatican to present a German pope with one of her creations that aims to convey the horror of her and millions of others' experience at hands of the Nazis.

On Oct. 25, Rabbi Cahana accompanied his mother, who lives in Houston, Tex., to an audience at St. Peter's Basilica with Benedict XVI, whose curators had chosen one of her paintings for inclusion in the Vatican museums.

Unveiled at the meeting was the dark foreboding No Names, measuring seven feet high by almost four feet wide. This abstract work recalls the fear and dehumanization of concentration camp victims.

A railroad track vanishes into a black hole at the centre. Most of the canvas is covered with sequences of hazy numbers preceded by the letter A – the identification the nameless inmates were tattooed with. There is a hint of red at the end of the tunnel, which suggests a lick of flames, and white scatters the ground like a blanket of ash.

Benedict studied the painting intently and asked questions, said Rabbi Cahana, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth-El. He wondered what the yellowish cloud at the top centre symbolized. She explained that it represented the overwhelming stench of burning flesh that assaulted her nostrils when she arrived as a 15-year-old in March 1944.

She was scheduled to be gassed at Birkenau on Oct. 7, the same day an uprising by workers at one of the crematoria broke out. The panicked SS ordered her and the other women out of the gas chamber and back to their barracks.

Later she and her sister, Edith, were on the death march to Bergen-Belsen. Two days after liberation the girls were separated when Edith became very ill and was taken to a Red Cross hospital. Edith was never found after that.

Her mother, two brothers, grandfather, aunts and uncles did not survive, either.

Lok Cahana has dedicated her work to Holocaust remembrance since returning to her hometown of Sarvar in 1978.

She was one of five Hungarian survivors portrayed in Steven Spielberg's 1999 award-winning documentary The Last Days.

Rabbi Cahana said it is his mother's hope that the work can serve to bridge the Jewish and Catholic communities, and play a part in promoting peace and unity in the world.

"She described her meeting with the pope as a deeply felt connection with someone who understands. She is very grateful for the meeting and the decision by the Vatican to include her art in its magnificent collections."

The painting will be housed with the Vatican's collection of modern art. Museums director Francesco Buranelli commented that the piece will "complete the important cycle of 20th-century art history in the Vatican museums."

He expressed delight in the acquisition and acknowledged the importance of her work. Other pieces are in the collections of Yad Vashem and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, among others.

The pontiff took Lok Cahana by the hand as she expressed her appreciation to him, as a survivor, for his visit last year to Auschwitz, one of his first acts as head of the Catholic Church. They conversed in English and German.

Lok Cahana had a dream one night soon after Benedict's visit to the camp that her art was shown at the Vatican. She shared the vision with her friends Harvey Rosenstock, a Houston psychiatrist, and his wife, Judith, who collect her work.

The couple sought the assistance of prominent citizen and Catholic community activist Raye White. She contacted Archbishop Oscar Lipscomb of Mobile, Ala., chair of the Vox Clara Committee, an international group of bishops who advise the Vatican on English liturgical translations. The committee was instrumental in realizing Lok Cahana's dream.

Over the past year, letters, phone calls and faxes were exchanged among Lipscomb, the Holy See and Rosenstock, a past president of Congregation Brith Shalom, where Lok Cahana's late husband, Moshe, had been rabbi. The Vatican chose No Names from her extensive portfolio of Holocaust art.

Also present during the audience were the artist's other son Rabbi Michael Cahana and his wife, cantor Ida Rae Cahana of Portland, Ore., daughter Reena Cahana of Houston, Karen Knie Cahana (Ronnie's wife), television journalist and friend Shara Fryer of Houston, the Rosenstocks and Archbishop Lipscomb.

Canadian Jews signed up for armed forces in large numbers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Hy Arlin enlisted in the Canadian military in 1942, he had the example of three older brothers to guide him. Leo, Mike and Kenneth had all became soldiers, leaving their home in the St. Laurent neighbourhood of Montreal to fight Hitler and the Nazis.

Shortly after he turned 19 and not long after he finished high school, Hy joined them. Assigned to the 23rd self-propelled artillery, 4th Division, he was sent overseas and saw action late in the war in Belgium, Holland and Germany. Kenneth, a gunner in an anti-aircraft unit, could boast a more extensive wartime resumé, fighting in North Africa, Italy and western Europe. Leo and Mike remained in Canada.

The Arlin boys all made it home uninjured, but remarkably for the modest-sized Jewish community of 168,000, theirs was not the family that contributed the most sons to Canada's war effort.

A report prepared by Canadian Jewish Congress, cited in its 1945-46 Handbook and Religious Calendar for Jewish Veterans and Servicemen and Women, points out that Jews flocked to joined the the military in great numbers.

"In 31 cities and towns throughout Canada, everyone of the Jewish men of military age is in the services," Congress reported at the time.

"There is scarcely a Jewish home that has not given of its best to the military services, and there are such as Rabbi Mazer of Ottawa who has seven sons in the Armed Forces, the Smiths of Ottawa, the Spiegelmans of Toronto, the Olfmans of Kamsack and the Kushners of Winnipeg who have five men in uniform," the handbook points out.

Altogether, 16,559 Jewish men and women served in the military, about 10 per cent of the community's population. Jews joined up in greater numbers proportionately than any other community and greater than Canadian society as a whole.

About 10,000 served in the army and 5,700 in the air force. A little more than 500 were in the navy.

Arlin, now 82, was the gunner of a self-propelled artillery tank – an open tracked vehicle whose weapon was a 25-pound artillery gun. He recalls that his unit moved through occupied Europe without much opposition.

But there was at least one time when he saw heavy action. "There was a time we were surrounded by three companies of German paratroopers and until we got reinforcements… I said the Shema."

Following the German surrender, Arlin served in the occupation forces, using his knowledge of Yiddish to help interrogate Austrian prisoners of war.

In the following years, he didn't talk much about his wartime experiences and was busy running three grocery stores.

For Hy, one of the most vivid and gratifying memories was the time he and Kenneth arranged coincidental weekend passes during the fighting so they could spend time together in Brussels and meeting Betty, his British war bride.

Harry Sklar as a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force

"Young people, even my wife who went through the London blitz, can't imagine what it's like living under constant fear of bombings every night," he said.

* * *

For Harry Sklar, the idea of being a foot soldier in the ground forces had no appeal whatsoever. "I hate walking, so I wasn't going to be a soldier," he said.

In the early days of the war, either 1939 or 1940, he doesn't recall exactly, he walked into a recruiting station on Bay Street in Toronto to see where he could best serve. When asked by the sergeant on duty what he wanted to do, he asked him where he could make the most money.

Aviation instructors earned $300 a month, he was told, so Sklar decided flying was the route for him.

A high school drop out who had to work to help his family make ends meet, Sklar had no aviation experience whatsoever. He signed up for basic lessons at a flying school at the Toronto Islands, and after 12 hours in the air, was issued a flying licence.

With that in hand he was now qualified to join the Royal Canadian Air Force. He continued his training as a flight instructor at the Leavens Brothers airfield, which at the time was located at Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue West.

His first day was far from auspicious. Hanging around the airfield, he saw a flight engineer killed in a crash in what was essentially a joy ride.

Undaunted, Sklar, now 90, went on to become a flight instructor who trained hundreds of pilots as part of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan.

At the start though, the training the trainer received seemed wholly inadequate. When he was introduced to the Tiger Moth, the basic training craft that was a single-engine twin-seat biplane, he was told to take up his best student – who had more experience than he – watch him and learn how to fly the plane from him.

That's how "I learned how to take off and land the plane," he said.

Sklar, who went on to found the furniture company that bears his name, was assigned to Virden, Man., where he spent two years training pilots. He had many Jewish students but also many French Canadians, who, it turned out, did not speak English. "I taught them to fly with hand signals," he recalled.

Sklar would become an A2, the highest ranking flight instructor and would eventually graduate to flying the Harvard, a large and noisy single-engine monoplane.

His students went on to further flight training, and many flew the famed Spitfire fighters and Lancaster heavy bombers.

Because he dropped out of school at age 12, Sklar did not have the educational qualifications to earn a commission. Ironically, many of his students would go on to become squadron leaders in the air forces of several Allied countries.

FOUR JEWISH CHILDREN URGENTLY NEED FOSTER HOMES

LONG TERM FOSTER CARE FOR 16-YEAR OLD GIRL

This artistic and semi-independent girl needs a centrally located home, where she can get the strong family support she requires. Ideally, the family will have teen siblings and someone at home after school.

3 SIBLINGS NEED A FOSTER HOME

A foster home in Thornhill would be ideal for these three siblings, who would like to stay together. They range in age from 8 to 14. Short or long-term care will be considered.

If you would like to explore the mitzvah of opening your heart and your home to these children, please contact

Coast to Coast

It was great living in Toronto, says former Star publisher

I don't know if the new publisher – Jagoda Pike – will want to carry these ideas forward."

Goldbloom said he has no hard feelings toward Robert Pritchard, the chief executive officer of Torstar Corp., the media company that controls the Star.

"I worked closely with him and have a high regard for him. He was very supportive of me and consistently positive about the work I was doing. I have a high regard for his leadership."

But Goldbloom was mum about John Honderich, his predecessor and a member of one of the five families that control the Star.

"You can say I have no comment," he said with a wan smile.

According to a story in the Globe and Mail, which Goldbloom said was authoritative, Honderich insistently demanded Goldbloom's sacking after claiming that he was not sufficiently committed to local, public-minded journalism and after Torstar shares hit their lowest point in two years.

One day, when he pens his memoirs, Goldbloom fully intends to write about his days at the Star. But for now, he prefers to dwell on the positive and on what he considers to be his achievements as publisher.

By his account, he pushed and prodded the Star further into the realm of explanatory and investigative journalism. "Our focus was more and more on the 'why' rather than on the 'who,' 'what,' and 'where.'"

Under his watch, he added, the Star provided breaking coverage of the arrest of 17 Muslim Canadians in southern Ontario accused of terrorism, of the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan, where 40 Canadian soldiers have been killed, and of last summer's war in Lebanon between Israel and Hezbollah.

Paper provided breaking coverage of war in Lebanon between Israel and Hezbollah

Before the Goldbloom era, the Star was constantly criticized by some Jews for its unfair coverage of Israel. He said he tried to remedy that by providing "balanced and accurate reporting."

Praising the Star's Jerusalem-based Middle East correspondent, Mitch Potter, Goldbloom described him as "an outstanding journalist" who strives for fairness.

He conceded that Star columnist Haroon Siddiqui is very critical of Israel and that he frequently disagreed with his pointed views. "But I didn't try to impede him."

Goldbloom said that other columnists, namely freelancer Anna Morgan and staffer Rosie DiManno, gave readers "a more sympathetic perspective" of Israel.

On the editorial page, where Goldbloom says he exercised the most influence, the Star showed understanding of Israel's controversial separation fence, urged Hamas to recognize Israel, recognized Iran's existential threat to Israel's survival and displayed sympathy for Israel's security needs.

Looking back, he observed, "I'd be comfortable with the perspective that the Star was more sympathetic to Israel, but no government is perfect."

Last March, he and wife wife spent 10 days in Israel on a private visit and later toured Egypt and Jordan.

"I developed a better appreciation of Israel's security barrier and of the fact that the vast majority of Israelis want peace."

He was also struck by a comment uttered by Shimon Peres, the current deputy prime minister and grand old man of Israeli politics. "Peres said, 'War unites and peace divides.'"

As well, Goldbloom is proud of his role in launching Star P.M., the first North American "downloadable" afternoon newspaper.

"We also invested heavily in our website," he said.

"The electronic delivery of information is here to stay, and will be the predominant mode of delivering news in the future. Our grandchildren will wonder why we chopped down forests to produce newspapers, only for readers to throw out the product the very next day."

Goldbloom, however, does not believe that print journalism will be completely supplanted by its digital upstart. "The two forms can coexist."

In his judgment, the newspaper industry has reached a critical crossroads. "This is probably the most challenging time in the history of newspapers."

Or, as he put it in a memo to staff on the day he left the Star on Oct. 16: "There are numerous structural pressures facing the industry: the decline in single copy sales, the decline in industry-wide readership, the migration of classified advertising to the Internet, the emergence of alternative sources for news and information and the increasing demands of advertisers to demonstrate measurable return-on-investment."

In the decades ahead, he said, newspapers will only be successful if they have "a portfolio of products," from a website to a downloadable afternoon newspaper.

Goldbloom, the son of distinguished pediatrician and Quebec politician Victor Goldbloom, is acutely aware that his ouster from the Star marks the second time in his publishing career that such a fate has befallen him.

After practising law and presiding over the fortunes of the YMCA as president and chief executive officer from 1991 to 1994, Goldbloom was president and publisher of the Gazette, Montreal's only English language daily.

Prior to that, he was a reporter, columnist and editorial board writer for the Gazette.

But after the Asper family bought the Gazette, he and the Aspers clashed, and Goldbloom resigned.

He subsequently re-emerged as a visiting scholar at the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada, where he met Heather Monroe-Blum and where he organized a major national conference on the Canadian media.

Asked if he is finally finished with the newspaper business, he replied, "You never say never. I love newspapers. Newspapers play a critical role in our democracy. But in the short term, I've made a decision to enter the university milieu."

At McGill, he will be in charge of managing relations with the federal, provincial and municipal governments and liaising with other organizations and public institutions.

"I look forward to returning to Montreal," he said, adding that he and his wife are currently looking for a house or a condominium to supplement their summer cottage in the Eastern Townships.

In parting, he said, "It was great living in Toronto and getting to know Canada's biggest city."

Pharmacist fraternity celebrates 80th anniversary

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

The 80th anniversary of the only Jewish fraternity of pharmacists, Rho Pi Phi, was celebrated last week at the group's annual Chancellor's Ball.

"There are many members of the [Toronto chapter]. Some are still with us and some have passed on," said Fred Stoll, chancellor of the only Canadian chapter of the international fraternity Rokeah.

The event, at Adath Israel synagogue, drew about 125 people and featured a speech by fraternity member Leslie Dan – a prominent philanthropist and founder of Novopharm – and a slide show titled A Walk Down Memory Lane, produced and directed by member Percy Skuy, former CEO of Ortho Pharmaceutical.

"[Rho Pi Phi] is important for two reasons. First, because the fraternity is celebrating its 80th year shows endurability and sustainability of the organization and, secondly, because there was a period of time when a lot of pharmacists in Toronto and elsewhere were Jewish," Dan told The CJN.

Dan, who has been a member of the fraternity since he began as a student at the University of Toronto's college of pharmacy in 1950, is also the major donor to the university's newly built Leslie Dan Faculty of Pharmacy.

"There was a camaraderie and professional bond between us and it's great to remember," he said.

"A lot of us are getting old – I mean over 70-plus. When that happens, we have a tendency to reflect what we did in the past – enjoy and reminisce, whatever that's about."

Other highlights of the event included a short speech by Wayne Hindmarsh, dean of the new Leslie Dan Faculty, and entertainment by singer Yitzhak Arganan.

Stoll said that there has not been any additional membership to the Toronto chapter in several years, due to there no longer being many Jewish male students studying pharmacy.

"Most of us are now in the senior-citizen class," said Stoll. "We have some members who are 50 and some who are into their 90s."

Stoll, who has been a member of the fraternity for more than 50 years, said Rokeah remains active, organizing various activities for its membership, including continuing education seminars.

"The last [educational seminar] we had was on nutrition for older people. We're going to be having one on the macular degeneration and other conditions that effect older people," said Stoll.

"We have social outings – we went to Niagara-on-the-Lake, for the Shaw Festival, and Stratford. We are basically a social club, and we give our members continuing education in the areas that affect senior citizens."

Dan, who became a member of the Order of Canada in 1996, credits the fraternity in helping him to become the man he is today.

"We would meet and exchange our professional problems. [We] learned from each other through the lectures and educational programs. [It promoted] more cohesion among members of the profession," he said.

"We learned how to practise better. It's good to keep in touch with members of your profession – whatever profession you have. Discuss your problems and how to deal with them."

COMMUNITY COMMENTS ABOUT MICHAEL

"On behalf of the Vaughan Professional Firefighters Association, I am pleased to endorse Mayor Michael Di Biase's candidacy for re-election on November 13th."
Bob Spragg, President Vaughan Professional Firefighters Association

"I see Mayor Di Biase as a strong, compassionate leader who takes the time to listen and to understand. He is genuinely interested in making our city a better place."
Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, Jewish-Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto

"Ever since meeting Michael Di Biase as a Regional Councillor eight years ago, I have been impressed by the quiet sense of sensitivity and dedication he exudes. To me the Mayor is not only an exceptionally capable and devoted civic leader, he is a true "mensch" who really cares about his constituents. Michael's noble spirit of humanity shines through everything that he does."
Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, Spiritual Leader, Chabad @ Flamingo

"Mayor Michael Di Biase has been a loyal friend of the Korean community and a tireless advocate for our concerns. His commitment and passion for reaching out to all residents is a result of his experience and leadership."
Bob Bak, Executive Director, Korean Community Centre for Multiculturalism

"Although I've known Michael for many years, it has only been in the last two years, since I joined him as a colleague on Council that I have been able to fully appreciate his leadership as Mayor. He has taken the initiative on so many important issues - the health centre, the subway, community safety and the environment, are just a few. Michael has led the Council from success to success. I look forward to him continuing to lead Vaughan for another four years."
Alan Shefman, Councillor, Ward 5

"This Council has worked extremely well together under the leadership of Michael, and has achieved many goals, including getting $670 Million from the Province for the extension of the subway to Vaughan Corporate Centre, and receiving approval from the Province for a Community Health Campus; a step towards getting a full service hospital."
Sandra Yeung-Racco, Councillor, Ward 4

Celebrity chefs help raise funds for Hadassah-WIZO

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You could call At Our Table the dinner party that grew.

Three years ago, the Toronto-based Tzedakah chapter of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO decided to hold a dinner party with celebrity chefs as a fundraiser for Hadassah-WIZO youth aliyah projects in Israel.

The event, held in two private homes on the same street, drew 125 women and raised $30,000.

Not wanting to tamper with their recipe for success, Tzedakah chapter opted to make At Our Table an annual event.

The second year, the event sold out in less than a week. In the third year, 220 women attended. Held at the end of May at the home of Warren and Debbie Kimel, At Our Table 2006 raised $60,000 for youth aliyah services.

Susan Lindzon, who co-chaired this year's event with Gali Azouri, says the corporate sponsorship campaign was so successful there were fewer tickets left to sell to the public. "A number of people stepped up their donations to the event as way to guarantee themselves a ticket."

The week the tickets went on sale to the public, supporters were scrambling to buy the remaining seats, she recalls. "People were dropping their envelopes in my mailbox after midnight and at seven in the morning. So many people wanted to be a part of it."

Lindzon likens the atmosphere of At My Table to the intimacy of a dinner party because the event is always held in private homes. "The home atmosphere gives it a heimish feel and that's part of the draw.

"Because of its reputation, there's a lot of excitement about the event. Women love a lady's night out – 220 women were educated and entertained."

This year, the educational portion changed from cooking to entertaining, Lindzon notes. "The theme of the night was to celebrate the joy of entertaining. Each of us learned how to entertain with creativity and style."

The featured guest speakers and demonstrators were party planner and television personality Nik Manojlovich, the Gemini Award-winning host of HGTV's Savoir Faire, and florist Frank Rea, owner and creative designer of Forget Me Not Flowers in Oakville.

"Everyone learned something," says Lindzon. "There was a lot of buzz. People came home with knowledge. They all got the special flower-cutting tools they needed to recreate the beautiful centrepieces that Frank [Rea] had demonstrated.

"Nik showed them how to set a beautiful table using your imagination and also how to use treasures at home for an original a table setting presentation."

Lindzon says the Tzedakah chapter's At Our Table committee was thrilled with the corporate support from caterers and other businesses. "Twenty different caterers contributed a specialty dish to enhance At Our Table. We got everything from dinner to dessert. Even cappuccino was donated."

There were also corporate donations for prizes and loot bags, she adds. "We had amazing prizes. The grand prize was a trip to New York.

"We truly appreciated the generosity of all our sponsors."

Planning the event took a lot of time and effort on the part of the At Our Table committee, says Lindzon. "It was like making a bar mitzvah. We worked from last September to the end of May.

"Everything worked out beautifully. The weather was perfect. The atmosphere was great. I had such wonderful e-mail and phone messages. I was overwhelmed.

"When it all comes together in the end and it is so well appreciated by people, it's incredibly satisfying. We raised a terrific amount of money for an important cause and people really enjoyed themselves."

At Our Table provided guests with many tantalizing choices for the taste buds. One of the standout items were the mousse-filled crepes from Foodmagic catering.

MAGICAL COCOA CREPES

1 cup all-purpose flour
1½ cups milk
1 egg
2 tbs. cocoa powder
2 tsp. pure vanilla
2 tbs. sugar
2 tbs. grape seed oil, plus more for cooking

Combine all the ingredients in a large bowl and whisk until the batter is smooth and well-mixed together. Allow the batter to sit one to two hours before using (to allow the gluten to rest). Heat 6-in. non-stick fry pan over medium-high heat till very hot, then brush with oil and pour in 1 oz. of batter. Swirl the batter in the pan to make sure that it evenly coats the pan then return to the heat and cook for two minutes. With your fingers, flip the crepe over, (surgical latex gloves can be used) and cook for another 30 seconds, sliding the finished crepe onto a holding platter. This recipe makes 12 crepes.

Fill the crepes with fruit, whipped cream or mousse, and drizzle with chocolate sauce, caramel or a fruit sauce or garnish with mixed berries.

The following mousse recipes come from Ester Brody's 250 best Custards, Cupcakes, Bread Puddings,& more (Robert Rose, 2004) can be used to fill the crepes.

Women's leaders outraged as agunot meet cancelled

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish women's rights leaders are reeling after Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi cancelled a conference of prominent rabbis that was to deal with the issue of women whose husbands refuse to give them divorce papers.

An agunah, which literally means a "chained" woman, is one whose husband refuses to give her a get, a document she needs under Jewish religious law for a divorce to be final. If she does not obtain a get but later remarries, any subsequent children she has are mamzers — or bastards. This label carries a harsh stigma in religious circles and limits who the children can marry under Jewish law.

Blu Greenberg

According to Halachah, a man can't be coerced into giving his wife a get, and in some cases, men have refused to give their wives gets for years, sometimes issuing the documents only in exchange for sizable ransoms.

The closed-door conference, arranged by Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar and the International Council of Jewish Women, would have been the first such forum for a large number of heads of beit dins, the local Jewish courts that oversee the get process, from around the world.

The conference was set for Nov. 7 to 8 in Jerusalem, and 27 of 56 rabbis invited to the conference had accepted the invitation. Last Thursday, they were notified of its cancellation via fax from Rabbi Eliahu Ben-Dahan, director of Israel's rabbinical courts.

A fax obtained by JTA said Rabbi Amar had decided to cancel the conference "due to petitions that came to him both from Israel and outside of Israel requesting its cancellation."

Those close to the situation say most of the pressure came from Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, a 96-year-old Ashkenazi rabbi who many consider the most authoritative in the haredi world. Rabbi Elyashiv could not be reached for comment and Rabbbi Amar's office would not tell JTA who had pressured him to quash the event.

"It's clear that the ultra-Orthodox leaders in Israel have been pressuring him, and it was too much to bear," Sharon Shenhav of the International Council of Jewish Women, who worked closely with Amar over the past two years to plan the conference, told JTA. "Shamefully, at the last minute he cancelled."

In recent days, several outside groups had been lobbying rabbis not to attend. One of the most outspoken was the Rabbinical Alliance of America, a haredi group that claims to have 750 member rabbis, according to spokesperson Rabbi Yehuda Levin.

Rabbi Levin left Nov. 2 for Israel to protest the agunah conference, as well as the upcoming WorldPride gay pride march in Jerusalem, which is also in doubt due to threats of violence from the haredi community.

Rabbi Levin said he had contacted a number of the rabbis invited and had convinced several not to show up.

"There is no problem with agunah," he told JTA before the conference was cancelled. "The reason they're doing this is because there is big pressure, a societal pressure of feminism, in which they paint the Orthodox as archaic and out of touch and put the Orthodox on the defensive."

Holding the conference, he said, would have sent "the message to rabbis worldwide that we are under the thumb of the feminists."

Rabbi Leib Landesman, head of a Jewish court in Monsey, N.Y., was invited but declined to attend because he saw the conference as an exercise in futility.

None of the speakers was "anyone who can even make a small dent in the issue of agunah," he told JTA. "Those behind the convention mean well, but if there is a lack of astuteness – and it's quite evident that there's no one there that really counts – then you can't even make a slight dent."

Rabbi Landesman called Rabbi Amar a "guest speaker, or the guest of honour, which adds some legitimacy," but said the conference would have been run by "some people who want to score points or do what is called political correctness. But that's not going to solve the problem of agunah."

Rabbi Landesman didn't deny that the problem exists, but he said it was too complicated for a sweeping solution, and rather should be examined locally, on a case-by-case basis.

Agunah activists were shocked and disappointed by the cancellation.

Montrealer Evelyn Brook, president of the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, said that "in the agunah activist community, there is great, great regret that [Rabbi Amar] didn't carry forth with his intention of holding the conference. Nobody knew what the results would be, but at least we would know where the issue stood on the rabbis' agendas."

Feminists are "asking rabbis to step forward," she said.

Toronto lawyer John Syrtash, an expert on the agunah situation, said he wasn't familiar with details of the conference, but he was surprised to hear that it had been cancelled.

Having helped organize a conference in Israel last year concerning a tentative agreement for Israel to adopt the Canadian model of Jewish divorce legislation – which prevents a civil divorce from being finalized if religious impediments to remarriage have not been removed – Syrtash said there has been "tremendous progress" toward that end.

Last year's meeting, he said, brought together feminists and heads of batei din for a "productive" meeting. "There were rabbis of every stripe, as far as I could tell."

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, chair of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, was also not familiar with this week's conference, but he said "everybody recognizes" the problem of agunot.

"Rabbis are very concerned about it."

There are halachic remedies for the agunah issue, Rabbi Schochet said, citing prenuptial agreements and community pressure.

It's unclear what will happen next. Shenhav said she spent last Thursday calling some of the rabbis who had agreed to come to Jerusalem to inform them of the cancellation.

"They were shocked and embarrassed and shamed," she said, noting that they hoped to speak with Rabbi Amar amid "some hint that he might retreat." As of last Friday, however, Rabbbi Amar had not backtracked.

Some of the rabbis scheduled to attend already had arrived in Israel. It's possible that those rabbis will still meet, but without the sanction of the chief rabbinate or the religious court system.

Others were left in the lurch. Rabbi Yosef Blau of Yeshiva University, a longtime agunah-rights advocate, said last Friday that he would go to Jerusalem to see if some meetings could still take place.

"My wife said to me, 'Now you should certainly go,'" Rabbi Blau said. "It would be a statement of support that shows that this is an important problem and people should be dealing with it. We shouldn't give in."

Blu Greenberg, a founding president of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance, said a few random meetings in lieu of a conference with the chief rabbi would "not be satisfactory," but added that the cancellation could prove to be a blessing in disguise.

"I think we are at the next step already, which is that as a community we're going to express disappointment and let-down," she said. Although much of the community was not even aware of the conference, "they'll be aware now," she said. "That will serve as an important counter-pressure."

"Until now, all of the pressure has come from the ultra-Orthodox," she said, but with the cancellation, "people of goodwill will take notice of this and will not be quiet."

Russian moves stir concern

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

A Russian plan to send a separate peacekeeping force to Lebanon has raised eyebrows in Israel, but officials say they have no objections to it.

But other steps by Russia – such as ties and arms supplies to radicals like Syria and Iran, and differences with Israel on key issues like Iran's nuclear weapons drive – are raising questions about Russia's role in the region.

Hawkish observers like Yigal Carmon, president of the Middle East Media and Research Institute (MEMRI), maintain that if it helps them return to prominence, the Russians would have no qualms about seeing Israel destroyed.

"They don't care about the Jews one way or the other. If it serves their interest to sacrifice us, that's what they will do," he says.

Regarding the Lebanon force, at least, Israel appears unconcerned.

Some observers see the force, operating independently of the French-led United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) peacekeepers, as a sign that Russia is seeking a foothold in the Levant that could prejudice Israeli interests. But the force will remain in Lebanon for only a short time, and will focus solely on reconstruction work. It consists of two teams – a contingent of engineering corps troops who are repairing bridges damaged in the Lebanon war and a small defence team to protect them.

Israeli officials say they would have preferred the Russians to operate within UNIFIL's framework but knew of the force in advance and support the troops' humanitarian work.

"The Russian presence is a bilateral arrangement between Russia and Lebanon and Israel has no problem with it," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev told JTA.

Russia says it plans to withdraw forces from Lebanon within six weeks, by which time the bridge repair work should be complete.

Analysis

They also are using their brief sojourn in Lebanon to make a point about relations with Muslims from Chechnya. JTA has learned that the soldiers guarding the engineers are from Chechen units in the Russian army.

Apparently the Russians believe rogue Lebanese militiamen are less likely to fire on fellow Muslims. They also want to give the Chechens a sense of being part of the Russian role in the Middle East and to showcase their domestic Muslim connections in a positive way, analysts say.

More than hurting Israeli interests, the Russians want to create the impression of being major players on the world stage, taking independent initiatives wherever they can, analysts maintain.

Nevertheless, Russia's ties to Syria and Iran and its position on Iranian nukes are raising concern in Israel.

MEMRI's Carmon sees Russia as part of the anti-Israel, Iran-Syria-Hezbollah axis. Most Israeli analysts, however, see Russia playing a far more responsible role. For example, Amnon Sela, a Russia expert at the Herzliya Institute for Interdisciplinary Studies, maintains that "Russia under Putin wants to show its independence on the world stage, but without compromising its close ties with the U.S., the EU and the G-8."

In the Middle East, that translates into Russia going along with international initiatives, while seeking to carve out niches where Russia can play a special role.

Analysts identify a number of influential groups in Moscow pulling Russian foreign policy in different directions. The most powerful are the predominantly pro-western clique led by Putin. At the other end of the spectrum is the floundering military-industrial complex, motivated by profit and an abiding hatred of the United States, ready to sell arms wherever it can.

Israeli officials say there's no question that, for now, Putin's is the dominant voice, and he's fully in control.

Vladimir Putin

"Putin is a great friend of Israel's and a great friend of the Jews," a senior official told JTA. "He may not be the only decision-maker in Russia, but thank God he's the most important one."

Still, Israeli-Russian relations have not been free of tension. One of the major sticking points was the large number of sophisticated Russian anti-tank weapons that wound up in Hezbollah hands and caused most Israeli casualties in the Lebanon war – exactly as Israel warned when Russia overrode Israeli objections on arms sales to Syria.

During Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's mid-October visit to Moscow, Russian leaders gave assurances that the flow of Russian arms to Hezbollah was a thing of the past. They told Olmert that Syria and Iran had broken contractual agreements not to allow Russian arms they bought to fall into the hands of third parties, and they promised to be stricter in the future about enforcing their arms-export rules.

An even bigger Israeli concern is Russia's ongoing relationship with Iran. The Russians are set to supply Tehran with $700 million worth of Tor M1 mobile anti-aircraft systems, which could put Israeli jets at risk in another round of fighting in Lebanon or help Iran protect nuclear installations in a showdown with Israel or the United States.

Then there's the Russian role in Iran's nuclear program. For years, Russia provided Iran with nuclear technology as they built the reactor at Bushehr.

On the upside, Russia has not allowed Iran to use the facility to produce nuclear fuel, and construction at Bushehr is about four years behind schedule, because the Russians apparently are dragging their feet.

But Olmert failed to persuade Putin to consider military steps to pre-empt Iran's nuclear weapons' drive.

Putin rules out military action against Iran

"The Iranians need to fear that something they don't want to happen to them will happen to them," the prime minister declared in Moscow, adding that Israel never would accept the idea of a nuclear Iran.

While acknowledging that Russia was deeply troubled by Iran's nuclear drive, Putin ruled out military action.

Still, Israeli officials dismiss the idea of a dark "strategic alliance" between Russia and Iran, arguing that, on the contrary, the Russians are deeply suspicious of Iranian motives.

"They have a lot of trade with Iran, that's true. But they know exactly what Iran is up to and what Iran stands for," one senior official told JTA. "They too are very worried about Islamic extremism. And it's not only the Chechen problem: There are 20 million Muslims in Russia, and the last thing they need is for them to go the extremist way."

But while Russia and Israel both oppose a nuclear Iran, the stakes for each are very different. Russia would simply train dozens of its nuclear weapons on Iranian cities, creating a balance of fear.

For Israel, however, nuclear weapons in the hands of a radical regime that calls for its destruction constitute a clear and present existential threat.

UN criticizes decision to hang Hussein

After the reading, he called out, "Life for the glorious nation, and death to its enemies!"

Also sentenced to death were Saddam's half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the one-time head of Iraq's former Revolutionary Court.

Saddam's deputy and former vice-president Taha Yassin Ramadan was sentenced to life in prison, while a former Baath party official, Mohammed Azawi Ali, was acquitted and immediately freed for lack of evidence.

Three other party officials, including a father and son, were sentenced to up to 15 years in prison for torture and premeditated murder.

Prior to the verdict, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Al-Maliki urged his fellow citizens to accept the verdict against Saddam without violence, but declared that the former dictator must get "what he deserves" with the decision that could send him to the gallows.

Al-Maliki's Islamic Dawa party claimed responsibility for a 1982 assassination attempt on Saddam that allegedly prompted a wave of revenge killings in the city of Dujail.

The verdicts handed down Sunday were to decide the guilt or innocence of the eight men on charges of crimes against humanity for the Dujail crackdown in which the accused allegedly arrested hundreds of people, including women and children, tortured some to death and killed 148 in all.

As the court proceedings finished Sunday, clashes broke out between police and gunmen in north Baghdad's Azamiyah district, which is dominated by hardliners from among Saddam's fellow Sunnis. In contrast, celebratory gunfire rang out in many other parts of the city.

The verdict was immediately condemned by the head of the second largest Sunni bloc in parliament, Salih al-Mutlaq, who predicted it would spark even greater bloodshed between Sunnis and the country's majority Shiites, who were heavily persecuted under Saddam's more than two decades of authoritarian rule but now largely control the government and security forces.

"It was not wise, and the government, not the court, has gone to the extreme with issuing this sentence, even in advance," al-Mutlaq told the al-Arabiya satellite television station.

"This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands, whose blood will be shed," al-Mutlaq said.

The United Nations on Sunday also criticized the decision to sentence Saddam Hussein to death, calling upon local authorities to refuse to hang him.

UN Human Rights Commission head Louise Arbour said the "appeal process is reliable and a vital part of the fair judicial procedure," Army Radio reported. She said that "the results of the appeal will be what they will be," and expressed hope that the Iraqi government would suspend its death sentence.

But U.S. President George W. Bush said Saddam's death sentence is a victory for "Iraq's young democracy" and U.S. security.

Bush's chief spokesperson, Tony Snow, said the fact that Saddam's trial was conducted by an independent Iraqi judiciary is an important component of the country's development.

"These are things that are absolutely vital to building a democracy that will not only sustain itself, but have the faith and support of the populace," Snow said.

Al-Maliki, the highly partisan Shiite Muslim prime minister who was forced into years of exile during Saddam's Sunni-dominated rule, imposed an open-ended curfew on Baghdad and two nearby provinces, and closed the international airport until further notice.

Earlier, checkpoints went up across Baghdad, and many cities and towns to the north were sealed by Saturday morning to keep residents in and potential attackers out.

The onerous measures threatened gunmen or anyone who ventured out with being shot on sight. Residents scrambled to stock up on food to wait it out indoors, and streets emptied by nightfall.

The judicial findings of Iraq's High Tribunal stood the chance of tipping the country into a full-blown civil war after a trial that stretched over nine months in 39 sessions and ended nearly 3½ months ago.

It was hoped that Saddam's trial would heal the deep wounds among Iraqis as they watched their former tormentor stand before his accusers and suffer the consequences of nearly a quarter-century of brutal rule, during which tens of thousands of Shiites and ethnic Kurds were killed.

In the meantime, however, the centre of the country flamed with sectarian killings that pitted Saddam's now disaffected Sunni backers against the newly empowered Shiites and their revenge-seeking militiamen and death squads.

Al-Maliki, who has been in office since May, has essentially looked the other way, paying lip-service to his role as leader of a nominal "unity government."

Ali al-Haidari, a witness in the Dujail attacks who still lives there, said the Tigris River city of 84,000 was quiet on the eve of the verdict. The market town is about 80 kilometres north of Baghdad.

Al-Haidari said Shiite tribesmen and police had mobilized on the roads and fields nearby in preparation for revenge attacks from Sunnis, whose communities surround the city.

"We are preparing to celebrate tomorrow if he is sentenced to death," al-Haidari said before the verdicts were read. He lost seven members of his family during the attacks on the city. "We hope he will be executed here, where he committed his crime."

In a televised message, al-Maliki said Iraqis should celebrate the guilty verdict but calmly and in a way that "does not risk their lives."

"We hope that the verdict will give this man what he deserves for the crimes he committed against the Iraqi people," said al-Maliki.

We thank all applicants for their interest, however, only those selected will be contacted.

Sharon leaves ICU

Former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was moved on Monday from Sheba Medical Center's intensive care unit back to his bed in the respiratory rehabilitation centre after his condition improved. An infection had reduced the functioning of the 78-year-old Sharon, who has been on a deep coma since his second stroke on Jan. 4. He was transferred to intensive care last Friday. Antibiotic treatment and other therapy fought the infection and strengthened his heart, a hospital spokesperson said.

Rabin's 11th Yahrzeit

Israelis observed 11 years since prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. Official ceremonies on Nov. 2 marked the Hebrew calendar date of the anniversary of his death. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert addressed a special Knesset session, praising Rabin as a great leader and called on those in the religious community who support pardoning Rabin's assassin to reflect on what the assassination meant.

Annan wants damages list

Kofi Annan proposed a registry of damages to Palestinians caused by Israel's West Bank security barrier. The proposal by the outgoing UN secretary general derives from a 2004 ruling against the barrier, which cuts through portions of West Bank land, by the UN's international court. The registry would entail setting up a new office, Annan says, but would not be a "compensation commission or a claims-resolution facility, nor would it be a judicial or quasi-judicial body." The International Court of Justice ruling was not binding, raising questions about enforcement.

IDF operates in Gaza

Israeli troops killed 12 Palestinians in the Gaza Strip last Friday. Eight were killed by the end of a 19-hour siege of a mosque in the northern town of Beit Hanoun, where at least a dozen Palestinian gunmen had taken refuge during an Israeli operation to wipe out terrorist cells launching rockets on Israel's south. Among the dead were two women, who were among hundreds of women who heeded a Hamas call to surround the mosque, forming a human shield so the gunmen inside could escape. Elsewhere in Gaza, a missile killed four Hamas terrorists travelling in a car. More than 20 Palestinians had been killed by Nov. 3 since Israel launched the incursion Nov. 1, but rocket attacks on southern Israel continued. In the West Bank last Friday, a 65-year-old woman from Bethlehem was killed in crossfire between Israeli troops and Palestinian gunmen; Israeli troops in Nablus killed a terrorist affiliated with the Fatah Party; and in Ramallah, Israel arrested a man Palestinians identified as the governing Hamas Party's public works minister.

PA poorer under Hamas

The Palestinian Authority's funding has dropped by 60 per cent since Hamas took power in March, according to a new report. The International Monetary Fund released the information, adding that the PA government payroll has increased. Between April and September, the PA took in $500 million (US), down from more than $1.2 billion in the same period the previous year. In that same period, some $420 million in foreign aid reached the Palestinian Authority, more than was received in all of 2005. Most of the funds came from Arab countries and bypassed Hamas, going straight to PA President Mahmoud Abbas. Israel has withheld tax and customs money from the government and the United States has backed efforts to refuse funding unless Hamas renounces terror and acknowledges Israel's right to exist.

Barak cabinet comeback?

Ehud Barak was expected to join Israel's government. Israeli media reported last week that the former prime minister likely would replace Sports and Culture Minister Ophir Pines-Paz, who tendered his resignation to protest the inclusion of the far-right Yisrael Beiteinu Party in the governing coalition. Barak and Pines-Paz both are from the centre-left Labor Party, though Barak has largely been absent from politics in recent months.

Liberal Leadership Race

On Dec. 2, the Liberal Party of Canada will choose its next leader. The CJN asked the eight candidates to answer a series of questions to explain their candidacy to our readers. Six of the candidates responded.

We asked each of them to limit their answers to about 600 words. We reproduce their responses below.

The following are the questions that we sent to the candidates.

1. Why do you believe you are the best candidate to lead the Liberal party?

2. Are there any previous experiences, aspects of your background or training that particularly inspired you or led you to believe that your contribution to the country would be worthier than that of your opponents?

3. Have any authors, books or teachers had a particularly important influence in shaping the individual you are today?

4. What unique characteristics do you envision for the Canada of 2016? In what ways are they different from the Canada of 2006?

5. Would you bring any new social and fiscal policy initiatives to the Liberal party? If so, please elaborate. Apart from new social or fiscal policy measure, are there any other new "large" or "bold" ideas that you want the people of Canada to debate?

6. Do you believe that Israel's response to the kidnappings and killings of its soldiers and to the rocket attacks against it by Hamas and Hezbollah respectively, amounted to excessive force or was disproportionate?

7. Do you believe that the government of Iran is attempting to develop a nuclear weapons capability? If so, how should the western world respond to it? Do you believe that Israel is in a vulnerable position because of the Iranian regime's repeated statements that "Israel should be wiped off the map?"

8. Do you believe Canada's voting record in the United Nations under the former Liberal government on resolutions concerning Israel was fair? Since there has been a marked departure by the Harper government from the former Liberal government's approach to the Israeli-Arab conflict, would you maintain or depart from the present government's policies in this area?

9. Do you agree that the "root cause" of the Arab-Israeli conflict is the refusal by Israel's enemies to accept a non-Muslim state in the middle of the Arab world?

10. If there is a personal statement you wish to direct to the readers of The Canadian Jewish News, please feel free to use this opportunity to do so.

'When the Jewish community feels secure, all feel the same'

1. & 2. I have more experience as a cabinet minister than the seven other candidates together in this leadership race. I was the minister of intergovernmental affairs longer than any other Canadian since Confederation and, as unity minister, authored the Clarity Act for the benefit of all Canadians and the future of our country. As minister of the environment, I brought the world together in the fight against climate change at the Conference of the United Nations on Climate Change in Montreal in December 2005. I have campaigned successfully in my riding and for my party in five consecutive elections. I would argue that it is better to have had experience in the party and in the federal government than to have neither. And it is even better to have had successful experiences!

Stéphane Dion

3. Many. My first teacher was my father, Prof. Léon Dion of Université Laval. He introduced me to the greatest liberal philosophers: Stuart Mill, de Tocqueville, Galbraith… My mother made me a fan of Zola, the greatest novelist of the working class at the beginning of industrialization that one may find. My directors for my MA and PhD theses, Vincent Lemieux and Michel Crozier, have also been very influential.

4. I am campaigning on the three-pillar approach: weaving together economic vitality, social justice and environmental sustainability. I want Canada on the podium of the new industrial revolution of the 21st century, the sustainable economy. Hence, we will be more competitive, have a better quality of life and more room to improve the social justice for the people in need. And we will play our role in the world for the biggest issue of the century: the reconciliation between the people and the planet.

5. I brought forward many bold policies that will give us the toughest regulations for clean air, the most targeted investments for clean water, the most compelling policy for climate change and energy efficiency, the strongest link between research and development in order to go successfully from the lab to the market, and the best protection for the health of our children against toxins, chemicals and other dangerous products. These policies are original, focusing on what will be overall an environmental tax reform for Canada.

I have also released proactive plans for promoting more women and youth in politics, faster integration of newcomers into Canadian society, the most aggressive plan to eliminate child poverty and help the working poor to get over the welfare wall. And I will do the same for aboriginal peoples. I am too ambitious for my country to tolerate any barriers preventing any Canadians from offering their full talents and skills to the betterment of themselves and our country.

There are many more policies to come over the next few weeks. All of them lead toward the same goal: weaving together economic vitality, social justice and environmental sustainability. Obviously, all these policies have been shaped with debates with Canadians and will be improved and implemented in the same way. With them and for them.

6. I believe that our friend Israel has the full right to exist and to defend itself. I believe that Hamas and Hezbollah are terrorist groups. Sadly, I also believe that the intervention in Lebanon has not provided any lasting security for Israeli and Lebanese people. And despite all the casualties and all the destruction on both sides of the border, the kidnapped soldiers have not yet been returned, Hezbollah is stronger than ever and the legitimate Lebanese institutions have been weakened. It's why I think it was right to be among those who called for an immediate ceasefire at the outset of the conflict, as a friend of Israel and Lebanon. I know that many Israelis, including military experts, did the same.

7. It is very likely that Iran is, indeed, attempting to develop nuclear weapons capabilities and this is a threat to Israel. Canada should work with all of our allies to put meaningful pressure on the Iranian regime, including effective sanctions.

8. I must admit that I am not an expert on these kinds of UN resolutions and I have some doubts about their effectiveness. I think there are far too many regarding the Middle East and that target Israel and this is disproportionate in view of the numerous other issues that the world is facing. My sense is that former minister Pierre Pettigrew made sound calls, although he was criticized by both sides.

9. I think there are people of good faith on both sides who want what Canada wants: two states living in security and peace, with a contiguous border. Canada must work with these people of good faith to achieve this aim. And all our gestures and declarations must support this very important objective.

10. In my riding of St. Laurent-Cartierville, on the island of Montreal, an elementary school library was burned down in 2004, precisely because it was a Jewish school. I considered these children as my children. Canada must make sure that all its communities feel confident and secure. My bellwether to assess our success is the Jewish community. When the Jewish community feels secure in a country, it is likely that all the other communities will feel the same. And I say so as an MP who has both substantial Jewish and Muslim communities living together. Usually, when one feels secure, the other feels secure too. If there is a country that may show the world that Jewish and Muslim communities can live together in harmony, it is Canada. This conviction has guided me as an MP, and it will guide me as a prime minister.

'Canadian government's role to help find a secure peace'

1. I know this country. I have been almost everywhere. And when I go, people approach me. They want to talk about their lives, about their communities, their country, their hopes, their points of pride, their fears. I listen. I try to put myself inside their skin, to understand. Then, with the energy and inspiration that comes from "being there," from experiencing things first hand, to act. To make things better than before.

We're an immensely successful country by any international measure – economic, social, quality of life. We need to know this in order to know what our ambitions should be. Because I know the country, I think I know what those ambitions are. It means taking on big things – Kyoto and climate change; Kelowna and fairness for aboriginal peoples; becoming a real learning society. It means an inclusive, generous, optimistic "Big Canada." It means a Canada with an ever larger role to play in the world. And being a connector, I think I can help get us there.

2. I think my answer to the first question covers No. 2.

As for the second part of the question, I don't compare myself to other candidates in the race. That is for others to assess.

3. The biggest influence on me as a child was my parents: in how I understand myself and other people; in how I understand Canada; in what as human beings we owe to each other; in how a community and society work; in how we need to work for what we get, yet in how we are lucky for what we receive; in how, in everything you do, you try. You try because there is no point doing anything if it isn't done well, and because that is how you discover what your best is. In how doing good is hard and worthy, in how doing great is far harder and far more worthwhile.

My brother, Dave, was also a huge influence on my life.

While not my teachers in the formal sense, they instilled in me as a kid things that are still at my core today.

Ken Dryden

4. As a country, we are an unbelievable mix of race, language, religion and culture. Growing from our heritage founded upon two cultures and two languages, Canada has evolved into a "live and let live" country, which is the only way a bilingual society can work, the only way a multicultural society can work.

Ten years from now, we will be more comfortable and confident about what we are. It will be clearer that the global world of the future will belong to the middle and small powers who have the attitudes, instincts and experiences to work together, to deal with the more and more global questions we face – economic, environmental, security, pandemic, etc. Questions that cannot be faced by any individual country, no matter how big and powerful.

The way Canada works today is the only way the world of 2016 will work.

5. In September, I released A Big Canada: Politics With a Purpose. Politics With a Passion. It outlines a number of my directions and priorities.

A Big Canada is a learning society: as an individual, a community, a company, a country, our only real security, our only real opportunity is learning. Learning is the cornerstone of any social and economic policy – from a national early learning and child-care system to greater investments in post-secondary education, from new technologies and systems for new products and services in the workplace, to narrowing the gap between ideas and commercialization, to getting at and getting out all of the best learning that is in our immigrants and seniors.

A Big Canada is a fair society, in which all people – the poor, persons with disabilities, aboriginal Canadians, immigrants, Canadians living in rural and remote areas – are given a real chance to participate in the success of Canada.

A Big Canada is an environmental society: connecting matters of the economy, agriculture, public health, international affairs, trade and the tax system, it commits to immediate action on climate change, to regulatory measures aimed at clean air and water, and to agricultural policy for the 21st century that recognizes that farmers produce many environmental and societal goods.

A Big Canada is a global society. It understands that how well we do in the future inside our borders will depend more and more on how well we do, and how well the world does economically, socially, in matters of security, climate change and pandemics – outside our borders.

And along with these directions is a tone. A Politics with a Purpose requires a Politics with a Passion. Excitement over what we have done, outrage over what we have not yet – but must – achieve. These are big important tasks, worthy of us, worthy of our national government, worthy of the times, worthy of a Big Canada. (The full document can be found at www.kendryden.ca).

6. I support fully Israel's right to defend itself. That said, I don't think the word "proportionality" is very useful. To a non-Jew, the battle in south Lebanon had to do with kidnappings, periodic rocket attacks by Hezbollah and Israel's right to defend itself. To Israel, it had to do with the actions of a surrogate of Iran and Syria and was a matter of Israel's survival as a nation. "Proportionality" is in the eye of what one beholds.

7. The type of fissionable material being developed by Iran is not for peaceful purposes. Iran has been offered material suitable for power generation but has refused it. It is, therefore, prudent to assume bad faith. It is of great concern to see Iran with such weapons for two reasons: the direct threat it would pose to Israel and to Europe, and the possible proliferation of such weapons to other countries and other groups. It should be the United Nations that would be called upon to take all appropriate measures to prevent such a threat from arising. In the absence of UN action, and in the face of clear evidence of imminent thermonuclear capability in Iran, I would support Canada's participation in the taking of such measures by NATO, or by an alliance of like-minded nations that is prepared to act.

The statements made by Iran's regime are a vivid reminder of Israel's vulnerability.

8. I have always found Canada's voting record troubling. I don't find the wording of the resolutions helpful in any way to any party working towards peace in the region.

That said, all of this should be put in a context. From my conversations with Israeli officials during my visit to Israel 18 months ago, it was clear that these officials placed very little import on these votes and great import on the rich and committed variety of interactions and exchanges between our two countries, from the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement to Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, many of which were assisted greatly through our respective governments. How Canada was a "great friend of Israel."

The approach of any Canadian government to the Israeli-Arab conflict has always been and always needs to be: what role can I play that might advance the chances for a secure and sustainable peace in the region? Whatever seemed to be the case at the moment, the actions Mr. Harper took at the time of the latest conflict and their effect both in the Middle East and at home, must be judged against this standard. Simply, is Israel any safer and more secure today than it was five months ago?

9. I do not think the search for a "root cause" is a useful approach. Argument will not win the day. Results are what count. Whatever blame there is on any side, the parties must find their way through that and find agreement.

10. As I said in answer No. 8, the only role for a Canadian government is to help find a secure and sustainable peace in the Middle East. It means offering a determined and confident Canadian voice which has been, to date, absent. The test for any actions taken or words uttered: does this advance the chances for a secure and sustainable peace in the region?

Mr. Harper's recent comments about the majority of Liberal leadership candidates being "anti-Israel" were inaccurate and unfair, divisive and pandering, and unworthy of a prime minister.

Liberal Leadership Race

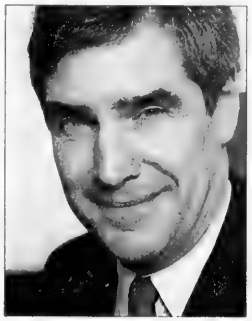
'The Liberal party has always been a friend to Israel'

1. I've been a Liberal all my life. I'm deeply proud to be a Liberal and to stand for the progressive tradition Liberals have upheld in Canada. I have spent the last six months travelling across the country, listening to Canadians from all walks of life, and I am convinced that Liberal party is most reflective of Canadian values and aspirations. I commit to being a leader who listens, and who sets high expectations and bold ambitions for a country that I know can be more than the sum of its parts.

2. All of the candidates bring tremendous energy and expertise to the race. I've spent my life as a journalist, author and professor, travelling the world and learning about different nations, their cultures, their challenges and aspirations. While I was out representing Canada to the world, I've never been far from home.

This experience has allowed me to see Canada clearly. We are now in an interconnected world, where issues like environment, security, trade and prosperity and immigration are global issues. Global issues are now domestic issues, and understanding that is critical for modern Canadian leadership.

3. Isaiah Berlin, the late Oxford philosopher, deeply influenced my political thought. I was his official biographer. The questions he explored, particularly in his later years, on identity, pluralism and belonging, are inextricably linked to my ideas about citizenship, civic nationalism and human rights. Berlin's views on political liberty offer the basic starting point for anyone thinking seriously about how people belong, as individuals in community and country.



Michael Ignatieff

4. The Canada of 2016 is much the same country it was in 2006, a successful multicultural and multi-ethnic democracy, with one important difference: it is a country that has chosen to lead. The Canada of 2016 takes itself seriously as a world leader on fundamental international issues, like alternative energy and economic and environmental sustainability.

5. I believe we need to have a strong national sustainable development strategy, support development overseas, commit to aboriginal Canada, invest in post-secondary education and make national unity – bringing people in this country together – a key priority. I'm looking forward to fighting for these issues.

6. I strongly supported Israel's right to respond to Hezbollah's provocation and to send the terrorist militia a very clear message that kidnapping soldiers and firing rockets on Israel will never be tolerated. Canada cannot be equivocal on this issue. In a conflict between a terrorist militia and a democratic state, Canada must always side with the democratic state. Israel has an unequivocal right to defend itself against unprovoked attacks, and the international community must support that right. There are injustices in every war where civilians are brought into the centre of the conflict, and the conflict between Israel and Hezbollah was no different. What Canada needs to do now is explore how it can play a role in preventing further conflicts in the region.

7. The denial of Israel's right to exist is unconscionable and must stop. Israelis live under the constant threat posed by Hezbollah and its backers, Iran and Syria, who continue to wrongly deny Israel's right to exist. Nuclear proliferation in the Middle East is not helpful in any respect. The international community must be firm in its resolve that long-term solutions to Middle East conflict do not involve nuclear proliferation.

8. The Middle East is a topic of deep importance for many Canadians. We are a country of immigrants, including many from conflict zones around the globe. As such, we have a special vocation for peace. This would guide my foreign policy. I believe Canada must always stand up in the international sphere for democracy, development, peace and international law. In the UN and elsewhere, Canada must side with the democracy, Israel, against the terrorist militias that threaten it and deny its existence.

9. Israel's neighbours must recognize its right to exist. This is an absolute precondition for a successful resolution of the conflict.

10. The Liberal party has always been a friend to Israel and the Canadian Jewish community, and we will always represent its interests both here in Canada and on the world stage.

'Must have the courage to renew the party'

1. I strongly believe I am the best candidate to lead the Liberal party because I understand the party and Canada in a way that is uniquely suited to our new challenges.

Canadians, particularly of my generation, need leadership to shake us out of our complacency in order to develop a new Canadian advantage to secure good jobs in the face of global competition, an aging population, environmental risk, and growing regional and rural urban inequities.

I have a lengthy track record of leadership inside and outside of politics where I set the vision and galvanized large numbers of Canadians to deliver outstanding results. I have learned to trust the Canadian public, and that faith has been reciprocated.

The Liberal party itself needs to establish new credibility with Canadians to become an effective mobilizing force for our country's future: that we are not just a party of power, but a party of purpose. I am seeking the mandate for renewal of the party into a 21st-century political organization that is completely open, is engaging of and accountable to its membership.

2. I want to say first of all that I believe all candidates in this race are worthy. Rather than being intrinsically better, I believe that I am the best leader for these times. I have spent the past 23 years in a career of service to the public, as a social entrepreneur, as a leading opposition critic and as minister and member of key cabinet committees. I have engaged directly with Canadians from the homeless and acutely poor, to busy parents, to corporate CEOs and organizations from a full range of cultural and religious diversity.

Throughout my time as executive director of the first and then the largest food bank organizations in Canada and as then as a national spokesperson, I worked with many community groups including Mazon Canada, "a Jewish response to hunger," to forge a strong consensus about eliminating hunger in our country. I learned how to harness community concern and altruism, without any government funding.

It is time for a leader who knows how all Canadians live.

I grew up in a small town in northern Manitoba, was trained and started out in Alberta, and then worked in Toronto. Through my wife, I have ties to the Maritimes and to French Acadians.

My time as a provincial cabinet minister also brings a perspective on necessary new partnership between federal and provincial governments that I believe is essential, not only to Quebec, but to reducing the divisions across all regions of the country.

Gerard Kennedy

It is time for a leader who can bring a pan-Canadian perspective that understands but is not rooted only in central Canada and can help unify the country in new ways.

As a lifelong Liberal, I know our party's history, strengths and weaknesses. As a provincial liberal, I bring a fresh perspective and image but with a strong connection to liberal values and practice. As a new generation Liberal, I have a proven track record of delivering results that matter to Canadian families, including higher test scores, lower dropout rates, labour stability and smaller class sizes.

It's time for a leader who has a track record of success and who can earn the trust of Canadians.

3. I have been fortunate to have the benefit of some exceptional people as key mentors. My father, who was our small town's mayor, councillor, school board chair and president of minor hockey, etc. imbued us with a keen sense of public service. Clara Lander, an English professor who taught high school in Winnipeg later in her career as an avocation, provided an enduring sense of intellectual curiosity, and Phil Byrne, an Irish-born engineer by way of South Africa, helped to develop food banks and taught me an effective form of social entrepreneurship, using business means for social ends.

My outlook has also been shaped by writers who have tried to reconcile faith beliefs with a pluralistic world, such as Jacques Maritain and Bernard Lonergan.

4. In order for Canada to compete with the rest of the world, the value of enterprise has to become part of our culture, for effective private enterprise, government and not for profits.

An enterprising Canada is one that is ambitious and that takes risks. An enterprising Canada is the opposite of the complacent country that my generation has permitted. An enterprising Canada is one that fuses economic and social policy together. Under my leadership, during my first five years in office, we will build an enterprising culture in Canada by:

- Ranking in the Top 5 in the world in productivity growth.
- Cutting the gap in number of individuals investing in start-up businesses (or "angel investors") between Canada and the United States in half.
- Ranking in the Top 5 in the world in private sector R&D intensity.
- Ranking in the Top 5 in the world in entrepreneurial activity.
- Signing free trade agreements with our Top 5 target partners (China, India, the European Union, Brazil and Japan).
- Eliminating the immigrant success gap with Canadian born.
- Becoming a clean energy superpower, working to achieve Kyoto commitments.
- Achieving 50 per cent representation by women and men.

5. I see a new Liberalism that fuses economic and social opportunity to maximize our human resources. Poverty turnaround is not just about income. It's about people and their dignity. It's about programs that start treating Canadians with the respect they deserve in acknowledgment of their full potential. How many people live in a grey zone of not being sick enough for disability but not able to hold a job? They're sitting on the sidelines right now. We must build in social and economic incentives and determine what level of security we are prepared to provide for people.

Rather than one program, we must focus our attention to undereducated single parents who have lost some of their health and have a higher propensity toward poverty. Our ability to maximize the human potential of individuals struggling with poverty will allow us to more fully compete in a globalized economy and become more competitive globally.

6. All of the civilian casualties in the latest escalation of conflict are tragic and highly regrettable. I have previously called for a ceasefire and maximum restraint in the right to protect and defend. Israel has a right to exist within secure, peaceful and internationally recognized borders. I also support the right for a future Palestinian state to similarly exist peacefully in a secure, viable manner. I deplore the fact that extremists have once again hijacked the agenda in the Middle East. Israel's and the Palestinians' right to self-defence has to be exercised in such a way that extremism is not fuelled by the response itself.

'My association with the community an affair of the heart'

1. I feel I have the experience, ideas and abilities for the job. As premier of Ontario. I ran Canada's second largest government. I also served as a federal member of Parliament. Elected eight times federally and provincially, I have a strong background in politics and government. Since leaving politics, I have tackled some other important public policy questions, both at home and abroad. I have also worked extensively in the private sector. I have drawn a number of my lessons from that work and I feel I have still more to contribute. I don't say I am better than the Almighty, just better than the alternatives.

2. Governing during a very tough recession was not easy, but it does teach one critical lessons about focus, the economy and fiscal discipline. I have worked extensively on the national unity file, and know the pitfalls there. I've travelled widely on issues of conflict resolution, and have an extensive personal history with the most intractable disputes.

3. I referred to the wisdom of Rabbi Hillel and his Three Questions in my book of the same name. I spoke to the three questions as a guide for us in public life: "If I am not for myself, who is for me? But if I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?" I've always had the benefit of great teachers, starting with my parents and now including my daughters.

4. We must take education and learning more seriously if we are to have a more productive and adaptable workforce and face the continuing challenge of global change. A pressing issue that time cannot reverse is global warming. We must incorporate sustainability into our economy. We must also get serious as a government about being part of the global solution, and the current government is essentially putting this issue off.

5. I see education and learning as key issues. The cost of post-secondary education has been rising rapidly. I would put in place a program of student grants and loans geared towards the living and tuition expenses of students. I would start with the least well-off students and move steadily upwards as fiscal circumstances permit. Every qualified student should have access to college and university. As well, Ottawa needs to be a full funding partner in supporting the base operations of colleges and universities and establish national priorities for labour market training, apprenticeship, research and graduate education.

Bob Rae

Learning starts with the early years. Tax policies need to make a fundamental shift to encouraging innovation and change.

The provinces and the federal government have to work much harder to make the federation work more efficiently and creatively. There is still too much overlap and duplication.

6. I have felt that it is not possible for those of us here to make judgments about actions on the ground and what is really proportionate.

Israel is entitled to defend itself. That said, the G-8 statement was right to call for restraint. The right to self-defence has to be exercised in such a way that extremism is not fuelled by the response itself. We must ask what steps we can take to ensure real peace and security, a peace that starts with a ceasefire and an end to violence, but goes well beyond that to deeper solutions.

7. The world community must take steps to ensure Iran complies with international law and co-operates with inspections and the IAEA.

The anti-Semitic and anti-Israel rhetoric of the Iranian leadership are a threat to both Israel and the peace of the world. They reinforce the need for vigilance, active discussions with all those with an interest in peace and stability. They also mean Canada has to insist on compliance with inspections.

8. Your readers will recall that the government of Paul Martin reviewed and changed Canada's voting on key motions at the UN General Assembly, in a move viewed by many as an important shift. Minister Pierre Pettigrew set forward a proposal to reform the voting in general with a proposed move to an omnibus resolution. I welcomed the openness to reviewing the voting pattern and would look to revisit the proposed reforms, which have not moved ahead under the Conservative government.

Mr. Harper has engaged in a lot of rhetoric, some of which, as it regards the positions of others such as myself, is simply untrue and politically motivated. The choices we face as a country are not between "decisiveness and dithering," or between "taking sides and neutrality."

They are rather between over-simplification and wisdom. We made a wise choice, the right choice, as a country, many years ago when we affirmed our support for an Israeli state in the Middle East. And we also made a wise choice when we affirmed the need for a Palestinian state. We need to take steps that will ensure real peace, a peace that involves a ceasefire and an end to violence, but goes well beyond that to deeper solutions. The answers lie more in the world of politics and diplomacy than anywhere else. Canada needs to work with our friends and allies to develop strategies that will have a deep and lasting effect. This is a world where slogans and bumper stickers don't really work.

9. From my experience in conflict resolution, the first step has to be "the acceptance of the other." This is the step that Egypt, Jordan and others have taken with respect to Israel. The radical terrorist organizations have not taken this critical step, and this is a clear barrier to resolving the conflict.

10. My association and involvement with the Jewish community is an affair of the heart. The community's commitment to social justice, to dialogue, to tzedakah, have taught me and inspired me.

'I have been an unwavering supporter of the community'

1. Leadership is a function of experience and depth of understanding of issues, processes and purpose. In federal politics it involves an unswerving commitment to pan-Canadian goals. It also requires the willingness to build and grow and to appreciate how those dynamics need to be integrated into an evolving society.

2. I came to Canada as a young boy at the age of seven to join my father, after we had been apart for four years. Canada has given me a wonderful wife and family, including four kids and six grandchildren. I received my formal and informal education in my home town of Toronto and at University of Toronto. Prior to entering politics, I was a teacher, administrator and businessman.

But one of the great honours for me was being elected to the House of Commons in the past six general elections. All the candidates are worthy. My experience is different: it reflects that wonderful adventure that is Canada for all who are new to our country. For me Canada is and should be in a mode of constant growth.

3. Dante.

4. Canada's population in 10 years will have increased by at least 10 per cent. All of it from abroad. All of it ethnoculturally and socially diverse. All of it integrated into one energetic, dynamic, innovative society, tolerant, respectful and embracing.

5. I would have an open demographic policy with a constructive immigration program to ensure a flexible, innovative market and sustainable functioning communities.

Joseph Volpe

6. As I said at the time in a press release, the Hezbollah action was an act of war and Israel was fully justified in its response.

Similarly with Hamas, cross-border attacks are acts of war which justify forceful defensive actions. I am very aware of the fact that both Hezbollah and Hamas advocate the destruction of Israel and are not parties to any peace process.

7. There is no doubt that Iran is on the road to nuclear weapons development and the western world must take strong action to prevent atomic weapons from falling into the hands of extremist regimes. If we fail to do so now, we will have to do it later and we, and especially Israel, may have to pay a heavy price. Diplomatic action has thus far not been successful. Other options must be considered.

8. I believe that Canada's foreign policy, including at the United Nations, has to reflect an effort at establishing peace in the region. One-sided anti-Israel resolutions are unfair and are anti-peace. Our goal needs to be security for all states and peoples in the Middle East.

9. I cannot speak for the mind-set of the Arab or Muslim world, but I do note that peace treaties between Israel, Jordan and Egypt have worked to the benefit of all. The historic refusal of most Arab governments and of Islamic states in the Middle East and beyond to accept Israel's legitimacy, and their support of terrorist actions against Israel, have to be overcome. Without that there can be no chance of a comprehensive peace.

10. Throughout my political career, I have been an unwavering and vocal supporter of the Canadian Jewish community and of Israel. Whether it is the issue of school funding, speaking out against anti-Semitism or in international affairs, through good times and bad, I have stood in solidarity with the community. I look forward to continuing to serve you.

'New Liberalism fuses economic, social imperatives'

Canada should always be a voice for restraint in the Middle East because we have to be as concerned about the consequences of actions as their justification. That being said, I am not prepared to judge Israeli strategy from the safety of Canada but will watch closely to see the evaluation by Israelis and international bodies.

7. All the evidence I have seen to date demonstrates that Iran is pursuing an offensive nuclear program. While Iran is a threat to the developed world, Israel finds itself in a particularly vulnerable position. I reject the anti-Israeli and anti-Holocaust views expressed by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in the strongest possible way. In order to pursue a nuclear-free Middle East, I agree with Israeli Defence Minister Amir Peretz's call for the UN Security Council to introduce broad-based sanctions against Iran to resolve these challenges and stop Tehran from getting the technological know-how necessary to build nuclear weapons. The international community must have a united voice to make Iran understand that the world does not accept the legitimacy of its nuclear program and to force Tehran to abandon their nuclear weapon ambitions.

8. I support previous Liberal governments' efforts to maintain a balanced and fair perspective on the Middle East. However, I would be more vigorous in the pursuit and support for (1) peaceful options and (2) effective means to deal with terrorist threats.

I support Israel's right to exist with secure borders and its right to defend its citizens from terrorist attacks, in accordance with standards of international law and human rights. I will support any resolution at the United Nations that is consistent with this position.

I also support the creation of a Palestinian state and oppose the establishment of settlements in the territories, unilateral moves by Israel to annex east Jerusalem and the construction of the security fence inside the West Bank and east Jerusalem. I will support any resolution at the United Nations that is consistent with this position.

I am concerned that too many General Assembly resolutions on the Middle East are divisive and lack balance in that they condemn Israeli violence but play down attacks against Israeli civilians. I will ensure that under my leadership balance is pushed for at the United Nations and in other international forums.

9. I think it is overly simplistic to try to boil generations of Middle Eastern conflict and almost 60 years of Arab-Israeli conflict down into a single "root cause." Obviously it is problematic that many countries in the Middle East continue to refuse to accept Israel's right to exist, but I think it is more important for us to look forward and for Canada and the entire developed world to play a constructive role in helping to bring about a lasting peace in the Middle East rather than trying to look backwards.

10. Liberals must have the courage to choose a leader who will renew the Liberal Party – a party that lets go of its past divisions and finds a new and vigorous expression as a practical progressive party that not only delivers results but isn't afraid to fully engage Canadians in their own future.

I have spent all of my adult life working with Canadians for whom this decision means the most – Canadians who too often go hungry through no fault of their own, new Canadians who don't yet get the full respect they deserve, young people unsure if Canada can meet their ambitions to start and grow a business and a wide swath of Canadians who wonder if we haven't been taking our country for granted. The new liberalism is about finding the fusion of our economic and social imperatives and an active citizenship that takes individual responsibility for how well our country works.

For all those reading, thanks for the time. For those eligible Liberals taking part on Dec. 2, I ask for your support and your participation in shaping the Liberal party that Canada needs right now.

UJA Federation Of Greater Toronto
Notice Of Meetings

TAKE NOTICE that the Annual General Meeting of the Members of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will be held at Adath Israel Synagogue, 37 Southbourne Avenue, Toronto on November 27, 2006 at 6:00 p.m. for the following purposes:

1. To receive the reports of the Chair and President
2. To elect the UJA Federation Council
3. To approve the continuance of the organization's operations into a newly incorporated entity (see explanation below) and
4. To approve and transact other business as may come before the members

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO is in the process of completing a corporate reorganization for the purpose of better aligning its corporate structure with its operations and governance model. As part of this reorganization, we have incorporated a new not-for-profit corporation. At the Annual General Meeting, the members of the unincorporated UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will be asked to approve the continuance of the organization's operations under the new corporation. A By-law, similar to the constitution of the unincorporated UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will govern the operations of the new corporation. Members interested in reviewing this By-law may request a copy by calling 416-635-2883 ext. 306 or emailing rgoldberg@ujafed.org. Getting out of your own way

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin Librach

Helping people find more joy, fulfilment and meaning in their lives is what life coaching is all about. Helping people answer the question, "Who am I at my best?" is what most life coaches help people do.

Think of someone who coaches sports. Aren't they helping each member of the team to tap into their motivation and play their best game ever? Most of the time just by championing, cheerleading and challenging ourselves, we can achieve great things.

But there is only one problem and I see it all the time. We stand in the way of our own success. We don't fully trust ourselves, creating an obstacle for ourselves that thwarts our own joy, development and our ability to move forward.

Rick Carson calls the obstacle the "gremlin." It is the voice of self-defeat, that inner critic in all of us who points out what is wrong, why we're going to fail, why we shouldn't move forward, and why we should take the safe route instead. In his book Taming Your Gremlin: A Surprisingly Simple Method for Getting Out of Your Own Way, Carson talks about how the gremlin will lose its power over us only when we can identify it for what it is, see our options and then choose what we really want, instead of letting that gremlin take over.

We all have that inner critic. It's that bully inside of us that tells us just when we're on the brink of success that we'll never do it, who are we kidding and so on. But guess what? You can silence that bully and take away his power away.

When I coach people, I ask them to draw their inner critic or gremlin, to make a picture of that person inside of us who tries to sabotage us. So try this simple exercise. Draw a picture of that gremlin inside of you and then write down three things that your inner critic says to you all the time.

For instance, for a client who wants to be an actress, her self-sabotaging comments might be, "I'm too old, I'm not pretty enough, and there are so many more talented people than me." So I will ask her to combat each of those phrases with something encouraging and positive: "I'm very young. Most actresses in Hollywood are working well into their 70s. Of course I'm pretty enough. In fact, I'm going to start each day by saying, 'Hello, gorgeous!' And in terms of being talented, I am very talented. I did fantastic in that last production, and I can't wait to do another play. Hello Broadway, move over Ethel Merman, here I come!"

Humour is also another great way to begin dispelling that gremlin. And I know many of you are saying, well, you also have to be realistic. Calling yourself Ethel Merman when your voice is more like Dame Edna's may not be your best bet. But the truth is, most people who succeed do so by believing in themselves. That belief will carry you further than almost anything.

Trusting yourself is the first step toward becoming clear about your vision, your values and your purpose in life. So how can you step out of your own way and free yourself up? If you were "at your best," what would you do right now?

I'll never forget when I coached my son's baseball team. He was seven at the time, and I didn't even know how to hit the ball, let alone coach an entire team. Just before each kid was up at bat, I whispered in his or her ear, "You're going to have the best hit ever," and inevitably, that's exactly what would happen. Afterward some of the kids came up to me and asked, "How did you know I was going to have a great hit?" I just smiled and said, "I don't know. I just knew." Just by helping them visualize that positive outcome went a very long way.

When you believe in yourself – trust in your abilities and visualize that winning goal, or that dream – you step out of your own way and focus on achieving what you want. The sky really is the limit. You can make anything and everything happen.

So I challenge you to go for your dreams, and tell that gremlin to take a hike and watch yourself soar like never before.

THE VARIETY I ENJOY

Student seeks volunteers for Save A Child's Heart

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — After spending a month in April 2006 with Save A Child's Heart (SACH), University of British Columbia medical student Tommy Gerschman has become passionate about helping the nonprofit organization from Canada.

SACH is an international humanitarian project that provides life-saving heart surgeries and followup care for children from developing countries

"I want to inform people about this organization, so they can see its amazing humanitarian efforts that reach around the world," said Gerschman, 26. "I want to connect people who are looking for elective opportunities to SACH, and I want to try and help fundraise for the organization."

Gerschman first travelled to Israel in 2004 with birthright, and knew then that he'd return to complete an elective there someday. When the time came, he contacted the Hillel organization through his university to find out about elective possibilities in Israel, and learned about Save A Child's Heart.

He described his month in the house SACH runs in Azur for recovering children as "amazing."

"On a medical level, it was fascinating to see patients from around the world with heart disease that you don't see often in North America because it's treated so early here," he said. "But on a human level, it was wonderful to be around a dozen children from five different countries, and to see three- and four-year-olds playing together, regardless of the fact that all speak different languages.

A project based at Israel's Wolfson Medical Center, SACH was founded by the late cardiac surgeon Dr. Amram Cohen in 1996, with a mission to improve the quality of pediatric cardiac care for children from developing countries who suffer from congenital heart disease. It is staffed by a team of 70 experts, ranging from the chief surgeon to the physiotherapist, all of whom contribute their time without any compensation.

Since its inception, the SACH medical team has examined and evaluated more than 4,300 children and performed more than 1,400 cardiac surgeries. The children come from all over the world, including Jordan, Iraq, Nigeria, Congo, Ethiopia, Zanzibar, Russia and Ukraine. SACH receives funding from government, business, institutions, foundations and individual donations, but funding will always be an issue, says Gerschman.

To this end, he has made it his mission to try to educate Vancouverites on SACH's work since his return, delivering presentations to synagogues, university students and Jewish men's clubs.

Israeli Arabs focus of timely and challenging book

Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel* by Dan Rabinowitz and Khawla Abu-Baker, University of California Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

During last summer's war in Lebanon, a number of Israeli Arabs – the descendants of Palestinians who remained in Israel after the upheavals of the 1948 war – expressed support for Hezbollah, thereby widening the already existing chasm between Jews and Arabs in Israel.

More recently, two additional events have exacerbated the situation.

Shortly after the war, several Israeli Arab members of Knesset went to Lebanon and Syria and voiced solidarity with their Arab brethren. By doing so, they highlighted the dichotomy between their loyalty to Israel and their affinity to fellow Arabs.

Two weeks ago, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert appointed Russian-born politician Avigdor Lieberman to his cabinet. Lieberman, like the right-wing parliamentarian Effi Eitam, has openly called for the "transfer" of Arab citizens from Israel. Understandably, Israeli Arab leaders were shocked and dismayed by the appointment.

For all these reasons, a newly published book on Israeli Arabs, Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel, is both timely and challenging.

The authors, Dan Rabinowitz and Khawla Abu-Baker, are Israeli academics. He is a senior lecturer in the department of sociology and anthropology at Tel Aviv University, while she teaches behavioural science at Emek Yisrael College.

They proceed from the assumption that the Israeli Arab minority, which represents about 20 per cent of Israel's overall population, has been marginalized and seethes with undercurrents of alienation, hostility and even hate.

Although they deal with the community at large, they focus on what they describe as the "stand-tall" generation: Israeli Arabs who were born in the last quarter of the 20th century and who came of political age with the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000 and the accompanying riots in Israel's Arab sector, which claimed the lives of 12 Arabs and a Jew.

It is abundantly clear that Israeli Arabs, especially the twenty-something generation to which the authors refer, are quite disillusioned and disaffected. Having concluded that they will never achieve real equality, they now demand a change in Israel's formal definition from "the state of the Jewish people" to "the state of all its citizens."

In practice, they want Israel to be a secular democratic state rather than a Jewish state underpinned by Zionism. Some Israeli Arabs who subscribe to this model are committed to a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. But others, who more strongly identify themselves as Palestinians, pure and simple, favour a binational state.

Whatever their views, they feel they are the subjects of discrimination. Israel granted the Palestinians living within its borders formal citizenship and voting rights. But for the first 18 years of Israel's statehood, Israeli Arabs lived under military rule. Even after this onerous restriction was lifted in 1966, they were excluded from a variety of welfare benefits and state-subsidized mortgages reserved for army veterans and new immigrants.

Israeli Arabs also complained of inequities in the allocation of municipal budgets and in employment opportunities, and never came to terms with the wholesale appropriation of much of their lands. At the end of the day, they considered themselves second-class citizens, a description shared by many Jewish observers in Israel and abroad.

In an attempt to place their status in its proper historical perspective, the authors go back nearly 60 years to Israel's War of Independence. When the dust of that war settled, the Arab community in what was Palestine was shattered and traumatized. Less than one-fifth of the original 750,000 Palestinian inhabitants were left, the others having fled, and more than 400 of their villages were gone, having been razed by the Israeli authorities.

The Palestinians who stayed in Israel were largely uneducated and often landless peasants. Their urban middle-class compatriots had vanished, having fled to neighbouring Arab countries such as Jordan and Syria.

Military rule confined Israeli Arabs to specific areas, while legislation stripped many of their assets.

Facing a new order, Israeli Arabs either accepted it quietly or fought it through membership in the Communist party. A third group, inspired by pan-Arabism, waited for Israel's destruction at the hands of triumphant Arab armies.

The authors claim that the Six Day War marked a watershed in Israeli Arab attitudes. The decisive nature of Israel's victory persuaded many that Israel was here to stay. "On the other hand, renewed contacts with Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip...exposed the Palestinian citizens of Israel to geographic, cultural and political universes in which Israel is a relatively negligible entity," Rabinowitz and Abu-Baker write.

They add that, with one exception, Israeli governments have virtually neglected their Arab citizens. Requiring the support of Arab parties for his political survival, Yitzhak Rabin, the incoming prime minister in 1992, directed a larger share of the national budget to Israeli Arabs.

The sometimes negative role that Israeli Arab parliamentarians play on the national scene is duly noted by Rabinowitz and Abu-Baker.

They concede that these MKs compete with each other "to unleash the most vitriolic rhetorical attacks against the Zionist establishment." The result is inevitable: "This tends to push them even further from the Israeli mainstream, ever narrowing their chances to gain access to real influence" and making it easier for some Israeli politicians to stigmatize Israeli Arabs as subversives pursuing a separatist agenda.

The authors offer recommendations to improve the lot of Israeli Arabs.

They believe that the expropriation of their lands must be stopped, and that master plans for Israeli Arab towns and villages must include sufficient land reserves for future expansion of residential and industrial areas.

In addition, Israeli Arabs should be given budgets that suit their needs and be permitted to create an autonomous education system. As well, Israel should formally recognize their tangible losses, compensate them for injustices done and post commemorative signs of their vanished villages. State symbols should be redesigned, immigration laws should be revised, official documents should also be inscribed in Arabic, and Muslim, Christian and Druze holidays should be officially recognized.

This is a tall order that may be beyond Israel's means, but Israel may have no alternative but to alter the status quo in order to retain the loyalty of a restive minority.

Gifted artist struggled with schizophrenia

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

From the time artist Miron Semec was a child until he committed suicide at age 46, he saw his world either in beautiful colours and vibrant life or in darkness and gloom.

Loved and respected for his kindness by all who knew him, he struggled with schizophrenia.

When he died, his grieving mother, Vera, discovered that her son had left more than 70 paintings and sculptures as well as some poetry.

"My son sold a few of his paintings, but he did not want to sell his pieces of art unless the person would enjoy them and really had a feeling for the work," she says. "That's the way he was."

And now she doesn't know what to do with the paintings. Most of them are in storage.

Artist Miron Semec

Interviewed in her small apartment in downtown Toronto, surrounded by some of her son's paintings and memorabilia, Semec tells her story, recalling the joy of Miron's loving charm and the pain and suffering of his mental illness, as well as the tragedies of her own life.

Her late husband, also named Miron, was a medical doctor and a Jewish survivor. He worked for the underground in Europe during the war and was captured and sent to the Gulag in Siberia as a prisoner for 12 years. When he was released, he went to Prague, where he resumed his medical practice.

In Prague, he met Vera, who was widowed and had a young son, Peter. She worked as his nurse. They married in 1958, and Miron was born in Prague in 1959. The Semecs and their two sons came to Canada in 1968.

"We came with two boys and two suitcases," Semec says. "My husband was told he couldn't practise here, so he went to work in a nursing home."

He died in 1973, when the boys were aged 12 and 9. "I was a widow again at 41 and had to raise the two boys," she says.

At the age of four, Miron already showed artistic talent. One of his first pictures was of devils hanging laundry. Miron was sent to a semi-private school, and at an early age began to behave erratically.

At first, doctors said his erratic behavior would pass, But in his teens the episodes became worse.

Studying at George Brown College and Central Technical High School, he excelled in oil painting, sculpture and printmaking. He exhibited his artwork in numerous galleries.

It was in his teens that he first attempted suicide, jumping from the Spadina Avenue bridge. He broke his spine and his legs and, after a long recovery, continued with his art endeavours.

For the remainder of his life, when his illness took hold, he was a patient at the Clarke Institute, where he made friends with fellow patients, doctors and nurses.

"I tried to treat him like a normal person," says his mother. "He worked for some time stocking shelves, but it was too difficult for him to continue."

Before his suicide, he wrote, "My work emphasizes the joy of life. I try to create something that is pleasing and makes the viewer see something more than the design.

"It should strike a chord and illustrate one's perception on a spiritual level, seeing what is optimistic, realistic and at times making a social commentary. "

Shoe Shine Man,
a painting by Miron Semec

In a moving tribute to Miron after his death, one of his psychiatrists at the Clarke Institute, Bruce Menchions, wrote that during the acute phase of Miron's illness, Miron described his experience as "somehow having to fly the airplane without being able to see where he was going."

Miron told the doctor the it was terrifying and every moment was full of unknowns.

"Gradually that would resolve, and he would be back to his normal state of mind where things didn't seem to be so confusing and he could paint and think better. But like the pilot of the plane, the canopy was still there between him and the real world," Menchions wrote.

"I have borrowed that description a few times, and often use it when I am teaching about schizophrenia. Thank you, Miron, for a clear description, but mostly thank you for sharing that one moment of you."

Harold Rosnick, a sculptor who taught at the Ontario College of Art (now the Ontario College of Art and Design), told The CJN that he had met with Miron's mother and viewed some of his art. "Miron had a lot of talent and insight," he says.

Rosnick added that he has approached several galleries, but they were not interested in artists that were not already discovered.

"I would like someone to exhibit Miron's paintings," says his mother. "Perhaps one day, a dealer or someone will want to do that."

Israeli singing sensation performs in Toronto to save a child's heart

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

She's performed with world famous celebrities including pop music legend Elton John, opera singer Andrea Bocelli and even former U.S. president Bill Clinton.

Yet somehow, Liel Kolet, Israel's hottest singing sensation who goes only by Liel, has managed to stay grounded.

"You know, I talk about it and I still don't really get it," the 17-year-old kibbutznik told The CJN days before her highly anticipated Toronto concert on Nov. 11.

Liel will lend her voice to a good cause by performing a concert on behalf of the Save a Child's Heart Foundation, an organization that treats children from less developed countries with congenital heart problems by bringing them to Israel for surgery and other cardiac care.

"They will fly a child from Africa to Israel if necessary and the beautiful thing about it is that each child goes to a place where they get the best treatment," Liel said about SACH.

"I've been to the hospital and I've seen these kids. They are so full of life and they are so happy, and it is really amazing."

Liel, who was in Toronto last summer to promote the UJA Emergency Campaign Launch to raise money for Israel during the Israel-Hezbollah war, will perform at the Toronto Centre for Performing Arts in North York and will also visit two Jewish day schools, the Toronto Heschel School and Bialik Hebrew Day School on Bathurst Street.

During the concert, she will be joined on stage by a 12-student choir from each school and they will sing Lu Yehi and We are the World with her.

Dr. Bill Williams, the former chief of cardiovascular surgery at The Hospital for Sick Children, who also trained the late founder of SACH, Dr. Ami Cohen, is being honoured for his work over the years.

He will be presented with an inscribed plaque brought from Israel by Dr. Bernie Goldman, the cardiac surgeon at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre.

Liel said that this won't be the first time she performs to raise money for SACH.

In April, Liel performed in Holland with Bocelli to raise money for the same cause.

"When I performed in Holland, it was very successful. We thought it would be great if we could do it again in Canada. I hope we'll be able to raise a lot of money. I know that the concert in Canada is almost sold out," said Liel, who is inspired by, and often compared to Canadian singer Celine Dion.

She said that ever since her performance three years ago at Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Perez's 80th birthday party, where she sang with a choir made up of Jewish and Arab children – and even sang John Lennon's song Imagine with Clinton – she decided to dedicate more than half of her concerts to charitable causes.

In fact, in 2005, Liel was awarded with a German radio award for being an artist who promotes peace and unity.

In December, she'll be performing with actor Robin Williams and Latin music star Shakira at the Teleton in Mexico, which is the biggest charity event in Latin America.

"It is one of the biggest shows every year and it is raises money for disabled people. I'm very happy to be a part of it because it is one of the biggest concerts in Latin America," Liel said.

But Liel isn't stopping there. Later this month she'll travel to London to sing Imagine with Madonna to promote an organization called Children of Peace, which aims to build friendship and trust between Israeli and Palestinian children.

"They chose me to be an ambassador for this organization and they chose my song, The Dream of Tomorrow to represent this organization… It is a song about the dream that children have to live in a peaceful world," she said, adding that ticket holders can expect to hear it at this week's concert.

Liel

Although the teen pop star keeps herself busy raising money for the needy and promoting messages of peace, she still manages to find the time to promote her music.

"My album, Unison, was just recently released in Europe, Germany, and Switzerland and soon it's going to be released in France and in Spain, and it was also just released in Mexico. I really wanted to come back to Canada and perform there. My album is also going to be released there very soon I hope."

Liel said that she was excited about making a stop in Germany, where Unison was chosen as album of the week, to promote the album that attempts to combine the Middle Eastern sound with western pop and rock tunes.

"My album is called Unison because it is a harmony of many different sounds, together with American and European sounds, pop and rock, I try to bring my Israeli roots together with Arab instruments," she said.

"This is something that people don't have the chance to listen to a lot. We try to bring something from myself, something that represents Liel. So, I hope that the music will be a very unique style."

A tribute to Cantor Louis Danto

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A group of distinguished cantors will perform a special concert in Toronto on Nov. 15 to honour Cantor Louis Danto.

"He's one of the great classical cantors of our generation," says Beth Sholom Synagogue Cantor Eric Moses, who will perform in the concert. "And this is an opportunity for his peers to pay tribute to him."

The performance, presented by the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, will feature a dozen cantors at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where Danto was cantor for nearly three decades.

Renowned for practising the art of bel canto

Throughout his career, Danto was renowned for practising the art of bel canto, a vocal style that originated in 16th-century Italy and reached a pinnacle in the opera era of the 19th century.

"Bel canto literally means beautiful singing, and it emphasizes a natural, even sound, like an instrument," explains Beth Emeth choir director Charles Heller, who worked alongside Danto for many years.

"Cantor Danto has phenomenal knowledge of this style… because he had fantastic training at the highest level and was meticulous about practising and experimenting for hours every day."

Danto's musical training began during his childhood in Poland, where he sang in synagogue choirs, shining brightly as a soloist.

During the war, he studied at the conservatory of Minsk and also received training on the cello.

He later trained in Rome, garnering praise from one of the top tenors of the 20th century, Beniamino Gigli.

As a cantor in the United States and Canada, Danto cemented a reputation for his bel canto singing, which he dubbed "the lost art."

"Until he was singing bel canto in the 1970s and 1980s, it was mostly forgotten," says Heller, author of the book, What to listen for in Jewish music. "That's why Cantor Danto called it the lost art."

Danto has recorded more than 20 solo albums and toured throughout North America, Europe and Israel.

In addition to cantorial melodies, he delighted audiences with Italian, Russian and French opera, as well as Yiddish music.

In 1984, he sang a prayer before Queen Elizabeth II in front of 16,000 people at Maple Leaf Gardens in Toronto.

He was also the proud recipient of an honorary doctorate in music from the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City.

"He's an expert," Heller says. "These cantors are paying tribute to him because they recognize his that."

Jewish literary journal faces funding crisis

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The 15th annual edition of Parchment, the only literary journal in Canada devoted to contemporary Canadian-Jewish writing, has postponed its usual November publication date due to a funding crisis.

"I'm hoping to publish it in the spring," said its energetic and ebullient editor, Adam Fuerstenberg, citing spiraling costs as the sole reason for the deferment.

"We have plenty of material for the next issue," he said. "The basic problem is that the subscriptions don't cover our costs. We are in need of some generous patrons to keep Parchment alive."

Fuerstenberg estimated that $4,000 would be enough to keep the journal afloat.

The possibility that it might fail has sent a tiny shock wave through the literary community. While some contributors may gripe that its acceptance standards are too low and that it's in bad need of good design, all seem grateful for its existence.

As the only venue for Jewish literary writing in Canada, its demise would cast a pall over the possibility of any similar publication being established over the next several years.

Parchment has produced a Journey prize winner and another finalist, and was the testing ground for a story by Lillian Nattal that became the genesis of her commercially successful novel, The River Midnight. The journal has also helped many lesser-known scribes and poets find their way into print; several have gone on to publish books.

"If you're a Richler you can get your stuff published anywhere," Fuerstenberg said. "But if you're not known, it's hard to get stuff published in Canada if you're writing on a Jewish theme."

The former Ryerson professor is confident Parchment will find its angels even as he contemplates winding down his own future with the journal.

Its present poetry editor, Ruth Panofsky – a Ryerson instructor who recently penned The Force of Vocation, a study of the life and works of writer Adele Wiseman – has agreed to step in next year as editor.

THREE TENORS FROM THE HOLY LAND TO SING AT BETH TZEDEC SYNAGOGUE

Show One Entertainment presents the Canadian debut of The Three Tenors from the Holy Land in the only Canadian stop on their North American tour. Three of the world's finest male voices – belonging to Felix Livshitz, Vladislav Goray and Yevgeni Shapovalov, called the "Israeli Pavarotti" – unite in an evening of opera, show tunes, Russian, Jewish and international favourites.

The concert also features pianist Igor Naymark. $118 to $36. A portion of the proceeds go to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel emergency campaign. Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St. Tuesday, Dec. 12, 8 p.m. 416-872-1111 or www.ticketmaster.ca

Rueth Zimmerman

Winnipeg centenarian grateful for every day

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — "I live each day as it comes. I have had happy times and sad times like most people. I feel that overall I have had a good life," says Rueth Zimmerman, who celebrates her 100th birthday on Nov. 15.

She actually commemorated the occasion with two parties in October. "You never know what the weather is going to be like in November in Winnipeg," she says.

The first party was with her fellow residents at 99 Wellington Cres., the apartment block where she has lived for the past 33 years. The party on Oct. 20 was given by family and friends.

"We also celebrated my sons' birthdays at that party," she says, noting that her son Manly turned 75 on Oct. 29 and Ron was 70 on Nov. 6.

More than 300 people, some of them from other parts of Canada and the United States, attended the party.

Zimmerman was born and raised in Minneapolis. Her parents, Leon Gottlieb and the former Fanny Perlman, were married in Winnipeg, she notes, and she has a great-grandmother buried here. Her parents operated a grocery store in Minneapolis.

Zimmerman, who looks much younger than her years, was the oldest of seven children. She has two surviving sisters living in Minneapolis.

She met her first husband, Norman, while she was visiting an aunt in Winnipeg, "I was invited to a party to which Norman was also invited," she recalls. "We met in the summer. At Christmas, he came to Minneapolis with a diamond ring. We were very happy together. He was a wonderful man."

The couple were married in 1929. They lived in apartments in the downtown area for the first few years before buying a house on Queenston.

Over the years, Rueth was an active member of Hadassah-WIZO (the Ezra chapter), the National Council of Jewish Women and the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

Norman died in 1963, and in 1973, Rueth married Sam Portigal. He died in 1992.

> 'I feel very privileged to have lived this long'

Up until five years ago, Zimmerman drove her car and did some travelling. As a result of some surgery, she is now using a walker to get around outside, although she can manage without the walker in her apartment.

"I thank my doctors for keeping me healthy," she says.

She says that she tries to get out most days but doesn't like going out at night. "At night, I would have to get picked up. I want to be independent. Fortunately, I can do most of what I need to do without any help.

"I feel very privileged to have lived this long and thank God for every day."

In addition to her sons, Zimmerman has four grandchildren – two here and two in Minneapolis (where Manly lives) and three great-grandchildren with a fourth on the way.

Legendary NBA coach built basketball's greatest dynasty

CJN News Services

BOSTON — Arnold "Red" Auerbach, the legendary Boston Celtics coach and general manager whose record of success in building a dynasty is unmatched in North American sports, died Oct. 28 of a heart attack. He was 89.

Known for his ever-present cigar, his commitment to winning and his keen judge of talent, Auerbach was also one of basketball's pioneers in opening the sport to black athletes and coaches.

The son of a Russian immigrant, Auerbach was born in Brooklyn and attended George Washington University. He joined the Basketball Association of America (BAA), the NBA's predecessor league in 1946, and when he retired in 1966 he had won two-thirds of all the games he coached, including a record nine NBA titles, eight of them in a row. He went on to serve as general manager of the Celtics, winning six more championships. As team president, he won one final title in 1986.

When he hired a former star player, Bill Russell, to succeed him as coach, it marked the first time a black became coach of a major professional team. Even earlier, he broke another taboo when in 1950 he drafted the league's first black player, Chuck Cooper.

Auerbach was inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame in 1969 and in 1980 was recognized as the greatest coach in NBA history by the Professional Basketball Writers' Association of America. He is also a member of the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Israel.

In the Celtics' glory years, from 1956-69, the team featured a star-studded lineup of future Hall of Famers that included Russell, Bob Cousy, Bill Sharman, John Havlicek, K.C. Jones and Sam Jones.

Auerbach stressed team play and a burning desire to win. In one quip, Auerbach was quoted as saying, "Show me a good loser and I'll show you a loser."

In his autobiography, Second Wind, Russell described Auerbach like this:

"Red would never let things get very far out of focus. He thought about winning more than I thought about eating when I was little. He ached when we didn't win; his whole body would be thrown out of whack when we lost. He didn't care about a players's statistics or reputation in the newspapers. All he thought about was the final score and who had helped put it on the board. He was our gyroscope, programmed solely for winning, and it was difficult for any of us to deviate from the course he set for us."

Auerbach infuriated opponents and their fans when he would light up his cigar on the court late in a game when it appeared victory was in the bag.

Eliot Sargon grew up in Boston during the Celtics' glory years. He recalls that the city's young Jews took tremendous pride in Auerbach's success.

"Auerbach was the biggest sports hero in Boston in the 1960s," he recalled.

When he named Russell as coach, "in a place like Boston, where historically there's always been racial tension, that was an admirable move," Sargon said.

Not only did he coach the team to consecutive titles, but he was a tremendous judge of talent, putting together a lineup in the 1980s that featured Larry Bird, Kevin McHale and Robert Parish, he said.

Fourteen of Auerbach's players made it to the Hall of Fame and 30 became coaches, including eight of the 12 players on his 1962-63 championship team.

Auerbach began his coaching career at a Washington, D.C., high school and during World War II worked in a military physical fitness program.

In 1946, when the BAA was founded, he coached the Washington franchise. After three years he had a brief stint with Duke University before returning to coach the Tri-City Blackhawks. His 28-29 record in 1949-50 marked the only time he had a losing record as a coach.

Auerbach joined the last-place and money-losing Celtics in 1950. The dynasty he built relied on defence and speed.

Bill Sharman, a former Boston guard, said "Auerbach was one of the greatest coaches in NBA history. He did so many things to help improve the game. I believe he was responsible for making the NBA as popular as it is today by introducing the fast break and making the game more exciting."

"I have been around a lot of competitive people, but his commitment to winning was absolute," said Cousy. "Nothing was more important. He was relentless and produced the greatest basketball dynasty so far that this country has ever seen and certainly that the NBA has ever seen."

Auerbach is survived by his daughters, Nancy Auerbach Collins and Randy Auerbach, a granddaughter and three great grandchildren. His wife, Dorothy, died in 2000.

Parker looks back on his Israeli hoops experience

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Anthony Parker wondered what he was doing in the Middle East when two weeks after arriving in Israel in 2000, the intifadah broke out.

Having signed a contract to play for a basketball team he knew virtually nothing about, the Naperville, Ill., native found himself in the middle of a war zone. Israelis and Palestinians were fighting in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, 45 minutes away from his new home.

It would have been easy to pack up and look for employment elsewhere, but Parker was determined to stay and help Israel's most successful franchise once again reach Euroleague supremacy.

He became a part of the community playing for Maccabi Tel Aviv, and while he's now back in North America playing for the Toronto Raptors, he tries to spread the word about how unfairly Israel is portrayed in the media.

"Anybody who goes to that region sees what a beautiful part of the world that is," said the 6-6 swingman, who left Maccabi over the summer to sign a three-year, $12 million (US) contract with the Raptors. "I do my best to give the other side of the story."

The 1997 first-round draft pick of the New Jersey Nets spent parts of three seasons in the NBA before embarking on what was supposed to be a one-year stint in Israel, playing in the European league. It turned into six, with a one-year stop at Virtus Roma in Italy.

Parker had a great experience and in becoming a huge fan favourite, earned a reputation throughout the basketball world as being the best player outside the NBA.

He says his time spent in Israel really helped to change how he views the world and different people.

Like any other Israeli resident, he developed a thick skin in relation to all the troubles, and he's said he felt safer walking around Tel Aviv than in any major U.S. city.

Parker, who plays small forward or shooting guard, led Maccabi to the Israeli championship in each of his five seasons with the team, and he guided the club to three Euroleague titles while being named MVP in each of the past two campaigns.

He said he'll always consider Israel a second home, and he managed to greet the people there in Hebrew prior to a game last month against his former team. It translated to, "Hi, I'm OK, and I miss you."

Parker said he wears number 18 for the Raptors, the Jewish symbol for life, as a gesture to the Israeli people.

'Wanna get a drink after work?'

Sandie Benitah
20Something

It's a social scenario I cringe just thinking about.

A colleague asks you out for drinks after work, and though it seems innocent enough, you can't help feeling guilty that saying yes might be leading him on to thinking you're interested in more than just a nine-to-five relationship.

What's a girl – or guy – to do?

Mention the boyfriend right away? Forget it, because it's a guaranteed disaster.

I can just picture it now.

"Wanna get a drink after work and kvetch about our boss?"

"I have a boyfriend."

"Good for you. So, wanna get a drink after work and kvetch about our boss?"

That's the best-case scenario if the guy doesn't call you out for being completely arrogant and self-absorbed.

A girlfriend of mine, let's call her Sarah, was faced with a similar scenario last week. She would frequently correspond with her Vancouver counterpart over e-mail and by telephone. Then he told her he'd be coming to Toronto for a visit and would she show him around town?

Always the drama queen, Sarah was convinced he "wanted to get to know her better." And she was completely distraught that telling him about her boyfriend at that moment would make her look immature professionally and personally.

"Why else would he come to Toronto where he has no friends and family?" she mused.

Hmm, I had to agree.

After losing about a week's worth of sleep and taking him around town two nights in a row, she finally found the perfect way to approach it.

When they met up for lunch on the third day she said, "We never talk about anything other than work, Paul. Tell me, do you have a girlfriend?"

Within five minutes, he knew she had a boyfriend and the drama was over. Lunch from then on was pleasant and stress-free.

That said, the e-mails and phone calls between them have subsided considerably since then.

Guys, although they often face the same dilemma, have a different approach, it turns out.

My good guy friend Carmine got frustrated with me the second I asked him for his advice.

"Girls need to be up front right away and make the situation clear or else guys won't get the message," he said.

"All girls are the same," he added for good measure.

But sure enough, when I asked him to put himself in our shoes for a second, he came to realize how awkward the situation can be.

"If only that was a guy's problem with girls!" he said, laughing.

It's a sticky situation we all face, no matter what gender we are or even how old we are.

My 50-something boss recently told me he was in a predicament at school where he is pursuing his PhD. It was awkward enough when a female classmate asked him for lunch, but he was at a loss for words when a man in his class kept asking him to hang out after school.

He didn't want to offend anybody by blurting out his heterosexual status, especially if it turned out the poor guy was just looking for a new friend. So he did what he's always done over the years.

"I told them I was sorry, but I had to rush back to work, or to my family, or to the gym – whatever I could come up with, just to get out of it," he said.

A little anti-social, that's for sure, but in some cases it's better to be anti-social than socially inappropriate.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I've been dating Mike for a few months now. We get along famously and are growing closer all the time.

Mike seems to have a disturbingly disproportionate number of female friends as compared to male ones. He doesn't hide them from me, and I assume these friendships are all platonic. Some of the women are even married. Nevertheless, it's a concern for me.

I don't want to seem like the jealous girlfriend, but I guess I am. I would rather be the only woman in his life. I don't feel comfortable asking him to give up all his female friends – yet – because I'm afraid that would reveal a side of me that he won't like.

How would you feel about your significant other having so many friends of the opposite sex?

Too Many Women

Dear Too Many Women

Jealousy is perceiving a normal circumstance as a potentially damaging one. This is a very strong and dangerous emotion. It can ruin a relationship that would otherwise be fine.

The bigger picture here is one of trust. Trust is the foundation of any successful partnership, whether it be personal or professional.

You say that you and Mike are growing closer all the time. You also mention that he doesn't hide his friendships from you. That's a great start. Work with that. Rather than putting restrictions on his friendships, maybe you could get to know some of these women a little better. He would probably be open to you meeting people that are important in his life, especially if your relationship is moving in that direction.

Try to be open-minded about his life prior to you becoming part of it. If you force him to give up people who are important to him, he may end up resenting you.

Sometimes jealousy can also stem from self-esteem problems. If that's the case, identify it and get help for it. You will benefit in so many ways in the long run.

Two lives coming together to form one bond takes work. It's not always easy or automatic, but if you keep the lines of communication open at all times and build a strong trust, the rest will work itself out.

Hagbah: a threat to masculinity

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Sweat is pouring out of me. I'm a nervous wreck, and I don't know if I'll be able to get through this. No, don't call me up to do hagbah (lifting the Torah). I'm not strong enough. My masculinity is at risk. I'm going to drop it, and don't want to be responsible for causing the entire shul too fast. They'll hate me.

This is what goes through the minds of many men (and sometimes women) who receive the kavod (the honour) of lifting the Torah upon completion of Torah reading.

Now, glilah (the honour that goes with hagbah), or wrapping the Torah, is more or less straightforward. It requires the individual to roll the Torah so it is tightly bound and then tie it with a velvet belt or a string. The individual then places the mantle, which can sometimes get stuck on one of the wooden ends, over the Torah. The breastplate, the yad – the hand used to point to the letters throughout the reading – and then the crown are put on the Torah. It's rather simple.

But hagbah – now there is a daunting task, especially the first time. If you are lucky, your first time around will be during the reading of Vayikra (or thereabouts) when the Torah is somewhat balanced – i.e., there is as much parchment on one side of the scroll as the other. On the other hand, if you are called up for hagbah on parshat Bereshit – the very first portion in the Torah – most of the parchment is on the left side of the Torah, so those who are left-handed will have to lift the Torah using their weakest side. That is cause for concern.

And here is how the actual lifting works. Keep in mind that most rookies have no idea there is a secret to hagbah. Here it is.

Firstly, approach the shulchan (the table) where the Torah lies. Don't look at the congregation because that will only heighten your blood pressure and your perception of what they are expecting of you – Arnold Schwarzenegger strength and agility.

Hold onto the wooden handles and, with the Torah slightly open, pull it down toward you while it is still lying on the table. At this point, half of the scroll is now on the table and the other half off.

Then, using leverage, you dip a little bit, press down on the bottom half of the Torah and then in one fell swoop lift it up using the weight of the bottom half to boost the scroll upward. Do not attempt to lift the Torah straight up, as many have tried, as it could tear, and so could a muscle. This is a fail-safe technique.

The strong guys will then unscroll the Torah, sometimes showing up to six panels – each one is about 1½ feet wide – and with the delight of Moses at Sinai, they will hold it high over their heads, turning front and back for all to see.

Most people have a hagbah story – the most common one dealing with their first time. A man I knew, who described himself as scrawny and an unlikely choice for the kavod of hagbah, told me that once he had successfully lifted the heaviest Torah in the shul, he realized even the thinnest or weakest Jews are able to hold the weight of the Torah high above their heads.

If you've never done it – good luck. Hagbah is by far the most nerve-racking honour in shul. You may want to print this article, however, and deposit it into your tallit bag, for that moment when your name is called. It might just dull your fear and give you the confidence needed to carry out this honour with grace and potency.

Treasures of Baycrest

A tribute to some of the men and women who have enhanced Baycrest and the lives of the elderly.

November 2006

About the Exhibit

At the turn of the 20th century, Toronto's Jewish community was rapidly building a strong infrastructure to accommodate the needs of its growing population. The welfare of one of its most vulnerable members – the frail elderly – was a primary concern.

In 1918, the volunteers of the Ezras Nashim Society collected money door-to-door to open Baycrest's forerunner, the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home on Cecil Street. Over thirty years later, community leaders purchased a 25-acre tract of land at Bathurst Street and Baycrest Avenue, which, by 1954, would become the site of a new Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest Hospital. For the first time in Canadian history, a chronic-care facility and home for the aged would share the same physical structure.

Over the next five decades, Baycrest would develop into one of the world's pre-eminent centres for care, research and education focused on aging. By incorporating residences, a chronic care hospital, a leading research institute and outpatient clinics, Baycrest would become world renowned as the resource on aging.

Thanks to a leadership gift from long-time supporter Joseph Gottdenker, the Treasures of Baycrest exhibit honours the achievements of the unique men and women who have enhanced Baycrest and the lives of the elderly. Featuring some of Baycrest's greatest treasures – donors, volunteers, staff, friends and clients – the exhibit will be updated on a regular basis to pay tribute to the hundreds of individuals deserving of this honour.

Joseph Gottdenker

Being the only and hidden child of Holocaust survivors Bina and Bendet Gottdenker, has been a fundamental force in my life.

That's why when a good friend introduced me to Baycrest and I discovered how well it catered to the unique needs of survivors and their families, I couldn't help but become involved.

Before long, a single gift to the 1985 capital campaign quickly grew into a full-fledged financial commitment and long-standing dedication of time and energy. In addition to establishing an endowment fund in honour of my parents for Baycrest's annual Yom Hashoah memorial service, I was also pleased to sponsor Caring for Aging Survivors of the Holocaust, a first-of-its-kind resource book designed to ensure elderly survivors, all over the world, are cared for with the utmost sensitivity and respect.

After joining the endowment committee, which I later co-chaired with Paula Cohen, I became a member of the Baycrest Foundation board, its treasurer, and then, later, chair of the donor recognition committee.

My mother lived in the Terrace, Baycrest Hospital, and the Home for the Aged for several years after my father passed away. As a result, I was able to see, firsthand, the exceptional way in which Baycrest cares for its clients, especially survivors with cognitive disorders whose long-term memories of the war can often be excruciating.

It was very important to me that we pay tribute to the many individuals who, over the years, have made Baycrest the special place it is. Building on the ideas and determination of Pinchas Gutter and other committee members, I am pleased to sponsor this Treasures of Baycrest exhibit.

Baycrest offered me the opportunity to give back to my community in a way that is particularly meaningful. I believe it is a showpiece to the world by taking exceptional care of our elderly, and by conducting research and education into aging.

The Treasures of Baycrest exhibit has been generously donated by Joseph Gottdenker.

Ida Abrams

I started out working for the Toronto Children's Aid Society in the adoptions department. Eventually, I moved to Jewish Family and Child Services under the supervision of Walter Lyons who then drew me over to Baycrest. I went from working for the young to the elderly in a very short time.

I raised my five children while I worked for Baycrest as a social worker for over 25 years. It was The Golden Age of Baycrest. We had a determined vision for the people who passed through our doors to make certain those who were eligible would get in. We were so proud to serve the community's needs.

The area in which I worked was intake. My job was to make certain Baycrest was the right place for each particular individual. It was important to me that the people who came through our doors were encouraged to be as independent as their abilities would allow.

In those days, the elderly would first come to Baycrest for the day; this was initiated to give potential residents an opportunity to see how they liked being in a community environment before making the decision to make it permanent.

Of course times change and situations change but the basic needs of the elderly remain the same. Baycrest must and still does fulfill those needs.

When my father was 103, he was still living on his own, in his own home. Quoting a very wise Rabbi, my father would often tell me: "To live a long and full life, don't be greedy, don't be envious, and don't look for honours."

Joseph Story Atkinson and the Atkinson Charitable Foundation

The Atkinson Charitable Foundation made history when it granted an unprecedented $100,000 to Baycrest in 1952. Not only was this a phenomenal sum for that time, but the award went towards funding something that didn't exist anywhere else in Canada – a comprehensive geriatric medical program integrating patient care with education.

"This was a very innovative grant because it was for geriatric care, a new field at that time," says Betsy Murray, an Atkinson Charitable Foundation trustee whose father, Joseph Story Atkinson, a former Toronto Star publisher and chairman of the foundation's board, attended the meeting that approved the grant. "My father was really the person pushing for this because he saw his own father dealing with the aging process and it really hit him."

Murray notes her father was impressed with the Jewish community for being one of very few in those days to make care of the elderly a community priority. "I think he admired the way the Jewish, Italian and, later, Chinese communities cared for their elders, so he thought this was an important cause," she reveals. "And because health care was part of the foundation's mandate and this was obviously something very new that wasn't available elsewhere, the foundation thought this was a noble cause to contribute to."

In later years, the Atkinson Charitable Foundation received an award from Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue recognizing its generosity to the Jewish community, especially the Baycrest grant. Looking at how Baycrest has flourished ever since, it was clearly money well spent.

Jack Baker

They call me the Singing Humourist because I always try to bring a joke, story or song when I volunteer at Baycrest. I've been volunteering there since 1958, and I've accumulated over 27,000 hours of service! For the last 17 years, I've worked in palliative care.

My mother was a patient at Baycrest. When she died, my father became a resident at 92. He was very happy there. My parents instilled in me the value of enriching the lives of the elderly and I passed this down to my children and grandchildren, who also became volunteers in other fields.

I first came to Baycrest through my B'nai Brith lodge, of which I was president. We supported the residents' Chanukah phone call program. Since then, I've had many jobs at Baycrest – one of them as a tour guide of the hospital and the home.

In the '60s, I had an idea to produce yarmulkes in denim at Baycrest. My late uncle, Saul Baker Sr., designed the yarmulkes and taught the residents how to sew them. I believe we were the first in North America to make them that way. We sold them to religious stores with the money benefitting Baycrest. Each yarmulke had a label that said, "Sewn by the residents of Baycrest."

In 1993, I was awarded the President's Service Award by the Men's Service Group. I was presented the Volunteer Service Award at Queen's Park by Lieutenant Governor Henry Jackman in 1994, and in 2006, I received the Ontario Volunteer Service Award. The Men's Service Group appointed me as a life trustee in 1995.

I volunteer because I want to and my philosophy is that if I can get a laugh or smile out of someone who is frail or in pain, I feel like a million bucks.

Jordan and Faith Banks

We both feel incredibly fortunate that leaders of previous generations have dedicated their time, money and passion to Baycrest. Faith and I believe it's now incumbent upon our younger generation to follow their lead and help guide Baycrest well into the 21st century.

I sit on the board of directors of Baycrest and the Baycrest Foundation. Over the past short while, it's been really exciting to see the momentum Baycrest has generated with their fund-raising efforts. Donations from the private sector are especially important these days and Baycrest is second to none when it comes to innovative fund-raising and using that money for incredibly impactful projects which have global implications.

In 2000, Faith and I started a charitable event in support of Baycrest called Sportsfest, which raises funds for Alzheimer's research, care and awareness. Three of our grandparents had Alzheimer's. Since we both had such close relationships with our grandparents, the work we do with Baycrest is very much out of respect and love for them and is small in comparison to what they were able to give us. Proudly, Sportsfest has been able to raise over $650,000.

We are all very much a product of a generation of people who worked hard to establish the opportunity-filled country in which we live. Unfortunately, too many of those people now suffer from Alzheimer's. We should all be thinking and doing everything we can to allow all people with Alzheimer's to age with dignity. Baycrest is a place that does absolutely that; it helps people live as long as possible, while maintaining their dignity. For Faith and me, that's hugely powerful and to be able to contribute to that, in even the smallest of ways, is tremendously gratifying.

Anne Birt

Sensitive, dedicated and compassionate are words colleagues and patients use to describe Dr. Anne Birt, who retired in 2001, after serving for 31 years as an attending physician at Baycrest.

"Anne Birt is probably one of the most outstanding family care physicians I've ever worked with," says her long-time supervisor, Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services. "Everyone she dealt with loved her and nothing was too much to ask of her if it was for the welfare of our patients and residents."

Born in London, England, Birt graduated from Middlesex Hospital Medical School in 1958, and immigrated to Canada in 1970. That year, she joined Baycrest, she says, as a "glorified intern" to re-qualify as a doctor in this country. She liked working with the elderly, in part because she greatly admired her own grandmother, and decided to stay on as an attending physician.

Over the years, Birt worked in palliative care and complex continuing care, supervised acute care in the former hospital, and was acting deputy medical director of Baycrest Terrace. In 1998, she left palliative care and became an attending physician at the JHA until the move to the Apotex Centre in 2000.

"There was nothing she wasn't willing to try," Gordon says. "She never said no and was an absolute pleasure to work with."

Birt was also a member of many committees and of the Baycrest board of directors. Even after retirement, she continues to sit on the clinical ethics committee.

"I loved working at Baycrest and after five years of retirement I still dream that I am there," she says. "They have done so much through research and its practical applications, to help the elderly stay well longer. And I loved Baycrest's multicultural environment. I've met people from so many different backgrounds and have learned that, at heart, we are all the same."

Frances Blugerman

My first acquaintance with Baycrest was in 1954 when my late husband Albert's beloved babeh Nessie Soren was transferred from the Cecil Street home to the new Jewish Home for the Aged (JHA) on Bathurst Street.

I started working at the JHA the day after Labour Day in 1958, on a four-month contract, half-time.

There were approximately 300 applicants to the home and a waiting period of almost three years for admission. Walter Lyons had pressed for the hiring of a social worker to meet with applicants and their families to assess relative need and help with exploring interim plans.

Sam Ruth agreed with the need for a social worker but he said, "There's no money." Walter said, "You'll find the money." Sam did, and I was hired.

Needless to say, more than a half-time social worker was needed and Sam continued to find money for more social workers.

Baycrest's social services department became a model for other institutions serving the elderly, including the Italian and Chinese communities.

In my 30 years at Baycrest, I learned, taught and supervised social work students and staff in the central intake department of the JHA.

I retired in 1989, and look back on my experience with pleasure – it was fulfilling professionally and personally.

I pay particular tribute to Sam Ruth, Walter Lyons and Abe Posluns, true visionaries, for their commitment to quality services for the aged and to the policy of admission to the JHA on the basis of need. They valued the skills of professional social service and treated all staff with concern and respect.

I started work when Baycrest was one building housing the home and Baycrest Hospital – just look at it now!

David Brown
1862 – 1953

In 1918, David Brown was hired as the first superintendent of the Moshav Zekanim, or Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home. His great-granddaughter, Paula David, a senior social worker and co-ordinator of Baycrest's Holocaust resource program, keeps in her office the ceramic and gold-encrusted medallion he wore on special occasions, proclaiming him, in Yiddish text, "Superintendent."

Brown was hired "because he could daven," David relates. For over 20 years, he kept the books, oversaw the home and presided over synagogue services while his wife, Fayge, volunteered in the kitchen and with residents' personal care. "When their daughter Bessie died giving birth to twins, the grandparents raised the babies in the home," David explains. The twins, Rae and Irving (David's father), played ball on the porch. Brown made sure Irving could sing the prayers and taught him to lead the services. He also encouraged his daughters and granddaughters to study, David recalls. Brown stayed on staff until 1939, leaving to open a private home for the aged.

Irving became an active volunteer at Baycrest and life member of the Men's Service Group. He and his guitar were regulars at Baycrest's Community Day Centre for Seniors, where he ran a weekly music program. For over a decade, he also led Friday night services. He spent his last years at Baycrest Terrace and the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged.

Paula David's children, who are also musical, entertain at special events at the Terraces of Baycrest (formerly the Terrace), bringing the generational count to a grand total of four.

Orah Buck

At a party 20 years ago, Orah Buck overheard a well-known photographer "brag" to friends about donating pictures to Baycrest. Buck had just taken photography courses at Ryerson University and thought, "Maybe I could do that, too." Today, hundreds of her works hang on the walls of Baycrest, providing cultural enrichment for clients, families and visitors.

Buck loves to photograph nature and people, as reflected in the Time and Faces display, a series of resident portraits outside Baycrest's human resources department. She works closely with art co-ordinator Vivienne Marcus and frequently consults with staff and clients. When Buck and Marcus developed You're Never Too Old to Grow – a large mural in the Community Day Centre for Seniors, day centre members were asked to contribute by naming the most important people to include in the photographs.

"We wanted to make the whole experience of creating these displays – both the process and the finished result – meaningful for the people living and working there," Buck says. "My joy comes from knowing that during their everyday routines, staff and clients experience pleasure from my photographs."

Jewish themes are also a major interest for Buck and she has donated many photographs to Israeli charitable organizations. She also has five books registered with the American Library of Congress and has had several showings of her work, most recently The Golden Reign of Spain at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

"Orah is one of the most generous people I have ever met," Marcus says, "not only with her photographs, but also with her time. She's become part of our community and that involvement shows in her work. She really captures what Baycrest is all about."

Stephen Cole

I became involved with Baycrest in 1980 after Norm Schipper invited me to join the Terrace committee. That was it. I was hooked on the genuine good will and kindness all around me.

Throughout my years at Baycrest, I have had the best of mentors like Norm, Fred Karp and Syd Loftus. That they extended to me their warmth, dedication and willingness to share their experience and skills, was fabulous.

Through the years, the thousands of hours of work and generosity of all Baycrest's volunteers and staff made Baycrest unique in the world of health-care institutions. I have learned so much from all of them.

I value the way Baycrest listens carefully to the suggestions of the families of residents because, next to our professional caregivers, no one is more aware of our residents' concerns.

My involvement at Baycrest grew as I became more involved with the finance, strategic planning and advisory committees for Baycrest Hospital and what was then the Jewish Home for the Aged. I also served as treasurer for several years. It was during this time that I saw how everyone who served Baycrest made it their top priority.

As chair of the Baycrest board from 1992 to 1995, I was committed to expanding our outpatient and community day centre services to help older adults continue to live independently in their own homes.

I have always been proud of our approach to innovative care, research and education and the fact that we have a holistic understanding of the quality of life. To be able to help the elderly was, and will always be, an honour for me.

Margaret Daniels

"Every good nurse knows that a kind, friendly feeling for her patient helps him to maintain his self-respect, dignity and individuality." Those were the words and the credo of Margaret Daniels, Baycrest's first director of nursing.

Daniels was hired by the late Sam Ruth, shortly after he became Baycrest's CEO in 1956. She became nursing director in 1957 (until that time, the chief of medicine supervised nursing staff) and made it her personal responsibility to greet every new admission and ensure they received a complete physical examination.

Throughout her years at Baycrest, Daniels was a capable administrator and helped lay the foundation for an approach to care that has been a cornerstone for Baycrest.

"Our purpose," she stated, "is not only to cure disease when possible and alleviate suffering, but also to encourage patients and residents to take an active role in social situations and to live to the maximum of their physical and mental abilities."

She also felt that it was extremely important for nurses to relate well to their patients. "Communicating effectively is one very important way to improve the quality of care," she said at the time. "By getting to know our patients, we can support them emotionally, as well as physically, and also reach out to anxious relatives."

When Daniels retired from Baycrest in 1969, she spent time with incoming nursing director Marcia Dodick, who remembers Daniels stressing the importance of treating the elderly with respect. "I was also very impressed with how much Margaret knew about Judaism, even though she wasn't Jewish herself," she recalls. "She had made the effort to learn about it so as to provide better care."

"Margaret was an extremely sensitive and hands-on person," Sam Ruth said. "She was the warm and caring person that every resident knew and she was truly the Face of Baycrest."

Harvey Dobbs

1912 – 1984

One of Canada's earliest radio personalities, Harvey Dobbs, was a pioneer broadcaster, author, producer and writer for Canada's first quiz show, Did I Say That?, and jingle writer for some of the best known commercials in the '40s and '50s. He was also a man who took his community work seriously – so much so that despite a debilitating illness he spent his last days volunteering for Baycrest.

A long-time supporter of Boys Town in Jerusalem, Dobbs was honoured with Variety's highest honour, the Heart Award, and was twice elected Man of the Year by the Baycrest Men's Service Group, which he supported over the course of several decades.

Dobbs and his wife, Ruth, were first introduced to Baycrest by their close friends, former Baycrest CEO Sam Ruth and his wife, Nancy. Dobbs not only became involved himself but quickly earned a reputation for galvanizing other people to work for Baycrest.

His forte was writing and he utilized those skills and talents to Baycrest's advantage by founding the Men's Service Group's fund-raising magazine, the Honour Roll, and editing it for 20 years. His wife recalls that when illness overtook him in the mid-1980s, and he was no longer able to drive, she would take him to Baycrest daily so he could continue to work on the Honour Roll.

"Baycrest had become his life," she says. "Even when he was suffering terribly, he insisted on carrying on his work there. He felt very deeply about the importance of Baycrest to the community."

Tom and Karen Ehrlich

During the late-1980s, Baycrest president and chair Sydney Loftus realized the organization needed to recruit strong young leadership if it was to attract the next generation of supporters. Fortunately for Baycrest, Loftus didn't have to look far. Son-in-law Tom Ehrlich grabbed hold of the concept and with his wife, Karen, at his side, formed Baycrest's Leadership Development Group (LDG).

With Tom serving as inaugural president and, later, with Karen serving as a co-president, the LDG implemented its mandate of creating new, successful fund-raisers with signature events that included a heritage hunt car rally, playoff hockey draft, golf tournament and Art and Soul art auction. "We were thrilled with our many successes," recalls Tom who first learned about Baycrest when visiting his grandparents at the Terrace and Jewish Home for the Aged. "We exposed a new generation of younger adults to Baycrest by involving them in fun events. Also, by achieving our fund-raising goals, the LDG was encouraged to continue to attract new members and develop new projects."

"Baycrest was like an extension of our family," Karen says, referring to her father's long-standing service and her mother Sheila's active involvement, including her leadership role as chair of the art and design committee. "Baycrest was a topic of lively conversation during many Friday night dinners. My father took great pride in Baycrest's many achievements, particularly in its affiliation with the University of Toronto and the establishment of The Rotman Research Institute. He passed that pride on to us and we look forward to continuing our involvement well into the future."

Leona Finkler

1918 – 1996

Everyone knew that when Leona Finkler invited you for a cup of coffee, it was going to be an expensive one! That's because Finkler was a fund-raiser par excellence. "Her passion for Baycrest was contagious," daughter Pat Friedland says. "A gift to Baycrest may not have been uppermost in people's minds, but it didn't take long for her to win them over."

A Holocaust survivor from Poland who lost both parents in the war, Finkler felt strongly about the importance of Jewish continuity and caring for the elders in our society. It was this belief that fuelled her charitable and philanthropic work at Baycrest and many other organizations over several decades.

At Baycrest, Finkler helped co-ordinate numerous fund-raisers as the Women's Auxiliary (WA) president from 1980 to 1982. Friedland went on to hold the WA presidency, too, marking them as one of only two mother-daughter teams to share this feat. "Parents always want to pass down their values to their children and seeing me at Baycrest gave her a great sense of satisfaction," she says.

In addition to her leadership, Finkler was also a major donor. A number of bequests were left to Baycrest by her and her husband, Arnold. The family also established the Finkler International Visiting Scientist Endowment Fund, which supports clinical work and research.

Finkler was very active on the Baycrest board, Baycrest Foundation board and board of governors for many years. She was also involved with UJA, JNF, the National Board of Hadassah WIZO, and served as chair of the women's division of Israel Bonds. In 1986, with her husband at her side, she accepted an Honorary Doctorate of Humane Letters from Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, Israel for her community service.

"My mother gave so much of herself to Baycrest," Friedland says. "Baycrest was something she really believed in."

Phyllis Flatt

Baycrest, or as I knew it, the Moshav Zekaymin, Jewish Home for the Aged, has always been a part of my life. My grandmother, Nettie Albert, was involved with the original Women's Auxiliary (WA) on Cecil Street. My aunt, Anne Gans, was a past president of the WA. However, it was my mother, Beatrice Wolfe, who encouraged my involvement, which eventually led to my becoming president of the WA from 1991 to 1993.

Contributing to Baycrest as a volunteer, as well as financially, has always been important to my family. The Phyllis and Ab Flatt Endowment Fund was set up during my presidency in support of the many and varied programs and projects supported by the WA. The Beatrice Wolfe Music Therapy Endowment Fund was created because of my mother's love of music. She played the piano almost every day, instilling in my brother Howard and myself this same love. Through this endowment fund, residents and patients can also experience the joy and pleasure music can bring into their lives. Another endowment fund we set up was the Anne and Moses Flatt Endowment Fund, honouring the memories of Ab's parents. My father-in-law spent his last few months in the palliative care unit at Baycrest, receiving much love and care from the professionals and volunteers.

Baycrest is a world-class facility that we feel is worthy of our support, l'dor v'dor – from generation to generation.

Morris Frankfort

1885 – 1973

Morris Frankfort, a successful businessman and humanitarian, became a tower of strength for the Canadian Red Cross during WWII. The Red Cross showed their appreciation by making him vice-president in charge of disaster relief and sometime later honoured him for his outstanding relief efforts during Hurricane Hazel and the Noronic disaster.

During the war, the Right Honourable C.D. Howe appointed Frankfort to the War Time Prices and Trade Board as a Dollar-a-year Man, a high honour for business executives who received an annual salary of one dollar for helping the government during periods of crisis. After the war, Frankfort used his influence to encourage the Red Cross to offer disaster relief to Jewish immigrants coming to Canada from the ravages of Europe. His concern for humankind eventually led him to accept positions as the head of disaster relief for the Red Cross and vice-president of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. He also worked for Israel Bonds and the Toronto Hebrew Free Loan Society.

There weren't many charities Frankfort did not take under his wing, but being president of the original Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home on Cecil Street was his most favoured interest. His commitment only increased when he became one of the main planners and founders of the new Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest Hospital on Bathurst Street.

His son Sydney remembers as a young man, that every Sunday morning was reserved for his father's Baycrest meetings. As a result of his dedication, Morris Frankfort was honoured for bringing in the most contributions to the original Baycrest expansion fund.

Sydney made sure his father would continue to be remembered and respected through an endowment fund established in his name and the dedication of an elevator in the JHA also named in his honour.

Anne Gans
1921 – 1991

Anne Gans was passionate in her commitment to Baycrest. Following in the footsteps of her mother, Nettie Albert (a Baycrest pioneer), Gans dedicated herself to helping Baycrest prosper.

For a number of years, amongst other activities, Gans chaired an annual Baycrest fund-raising theatre event. "Our home became a show business box office," her daughter Francie Storm recalls. "There was a big ticket counter at the bottom of the stairs, and I can still remember how excited she got selling every ticket and how she didn't relax until all the tickets were sold."

Between 1961 and 1963, Gans brought her leadership and organizational skills and her enormous energy to the role of president of the Women's Auxiliary. She enjoyed the opportunity to work with wonderful women to pursue a shared goal.

Anne Gans lived her core value of giving back to the community. By her example, she left her family a legacy of commitment to social responsibility. Her legacy is reflected in the broad range of volunteer activities of her family. She would be proud.

Max and Gianna Glassman

I got married at my dying mother's bedside at Baycrest on May 19, 1958. Our scheduled date for marriage had been May 31st, but on the 19th, I went to visit my mother – Anne Glazman – and I detected she was dying. I told my fiancée, Gianna, that I wanted to get married that day and she said, "That's impossible," to which I replied, 'Nothing is impossible.'

The Rabbi told me he would marry us if we had a marriage licence, but we didn't have one. So I called a city councillor who had been a patient of mine. He got the clerk at city hall to open on compassionate grounds and then issued our licence. My mother came out of her coma during the ceremony. After the wedding, she said in Yiddish, "Well, now I can die (in peace)."

Years later, my sister, Ray, became a patient at Baycrest and that reinforced my connection. I felt duty bound to do something for Baycrest because of the experiences I had with my mother and sister. So my wife and I set up the Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman Chair in Neuropsychology at the University of Toronto and Baycrest.

About two or three years ago, my wife started to do volunteer work in Baycrest's creative arts studio. She got a tremendous charge out of helping the elderly. As my activities as a doctor decreased, I wanted to do something beneficial for Baycrest, too. This led to me doing volunteer psychotherapy as a chaplain under Rabbi Berlat.

I get a lot of compliments on what I do, but I think I'm the one who really gains from it. Baycrest is unique in the services it supplies.

Paul Godfrey

My first contact with Baycrest dates back to 1965 when I was a 25-year-old North York city councillor, representing Baycrest, which was then in the very early stages of expansion. Over the last few years, I've served as a director of Baycrest and have tried to assist with advice about government funding and meeting public expectations.

The biggest highlight for me was the building of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged. I was pleased to be a part of the delegation that showed Premier Mike Harris and the government the importance of Baycrest for geriatric care in Ontario and on a worldwide basis.

When I was chairman of metropolitan Toronto, I went with the Ontario minister of community and social services to visit various homes for geriatric care throughout North America. The people at these homes asked us, "Why are you here? Just go visit Baycrest – that's the model for geriatric care worldwide."

On the personal side, Baycrest plays a huge role in my family's life. My grandmother was in Baycrest, my mother is presently a resident, my late mother-in-law was there until October 2005, and my father-in-law has been a resident for two years. I believe Baycrest has kept my loved ones alive for many more years than they would have survived in another environment.

I personally support Baycrest because it's very important to provide the necessary funding for ongoing care. That's how you can help Baycrest continue to be the model it is today.

Wolfe and Tillie Goldberg

Wolfe 1900 – 1988, Tillie 1911 – 1996

No two people could have complimented each other more than Wolfe and Tillie Goldberg, says their son Gerry Goldberg, who compares the couple's relationship to the way each side of the brain functions. Wolfe was the practical one, a Polish immigrant who turned a shmatte business on Spadina Avenue into a thriving enterprise. He had a passion for Yiddishkeit and Judaic artifacts and helped authors in Israel publish books in the Yiddish language.

Tillie was "a very warm person, bubbly and very concerned about the Women's Auxiliary," recalls WA archiver and past president, Alma Waldman. "She did a great job," Waldman says of Tillie's stint as WA president. Tillie was a tireless worker for issues she felt were of vital importance to the community she loved: cancer care, Hadassah WIZO and Baycrest. "She taught through her deeds what it meant to make a difference," Gerry says, adding that his mother never drove, "but because she had this burning desire to help she did everything by streetcar and bus."

The Wolfe and Tillie Goldberg Foundation contributed, not surprisingly, to the preservation of Jewish history – by lending numerous items of Judaica to Baycrest's heritage museum. "They created a legacy of menschlichkeit which they passed down to their sons," Gerry says of himself and his brother, Dr. Melvin Goldberg, who, in fact, worked at Baycrest. "To my parents, Baycrest and Israel were everything." In carrying on their tradition, Gerry, Melvin and their families contributed to support the beauty shop, recalling that when their mother was a patient at Baycrest Hospital, going to the beauty shop was one of her greatest pleasures.

Milton and Jean Goldstein

My husband was enlisted to the volunteer core of Baycrest about 10 years before I came on board. He has been a proud volunteer for 20 years.

When he started out he was given the task of stuffing envelopes. He wasn't sure if it was the job for him until he realized he was sitting with several high-powered executives who were happily stuffing envelopes, as well.

Over the years, he worked for the Baycrest Foundation and Men's Service Group proudly doing just about any job they assigned him, including the Fun Run, tracing returned mail, and mapping out the delivery route for the Honour Roll.

My first assignment 10 years ago was to interview and place potential volunteers, a task I found to be challenging and rewarding. It's really satisfying to find the right people for the right job.

I remember one particular tall, elegant looking gentleman who walked into my office to offer his services. He was willing to help in any area he could and he was candid about why he was anxious to volunteer. He wanted a volunteer parking sticker so he could park closer to the building when he came daily to visit his wife. I immediately gave this man a job and I'll tell you why: He was a Yiddishist who delighted our residents with his lectures and stories... and best of all he was 89 years old. He worked for us for several years and was one of our favourite volunteers.

It's so important for people to volunteer in their senior years. It gives you a reason to get up, get dressed and discover every day, a whole world out there that needs you and appreciates your help.

Al J. Green

It wasn't enough for me to build the Terrace at Baycrest. I needed to make it beautiful, as well.

When Baycrest CEO Sam Ruth asked me to help build the new Baycrest residence in 1976, I didn't hesitate. My father had been involved with the Moshav Zekaynim on Cecil Street (Baycrest's forerunner), and it felt natural for me to follow in his footsteps.

Together with the members of the building committee, we planned, adjusted and built the custom building. When the austere, yellow brick structure was in its final stages my artistic instincts kicked in. I knew the building needed an artistic touch if it was truly to be a place people would call home.

After a thorough search I found a beautiful and compelling sculpture by Maryon Kanteroff, The Song of Deborah. This particular piece came with a high price tag but I managed to purchase it with the help of a government grant, donations from the committee, and my own personal contribution.

Over the years, as an avid sculptor, I have continued to try to enhance Baycrest's esthetic appeal by donating several of my most cherished pieces including Ben Gurion, Moses and Let My People Go. My wife, Malka, and I also established an endowment fund to support the creative arts studio on the main floor of the Jewish Home for the Aged.

Art can enhance life in so many ways, especially for seniors living with certain challenges. Whether we're doing art, learning about it or just enjoying its beauty and meaning, it's an invaluable part of our lives.

Alex Grossman

"When one is confronted with danger, daring action is required. That was the lesson I learned repeatedly as I outran and evaded the Gestapo during WWII," says Alex Grossman, stating a philosophy that has set the pattern for his journey to success.

A man of action and results throughout his life, Grossman survived the Holocaust and brought his wife, Genia, and daughter, Lilly, to safety in Canada just in time for the birth of their son, George. "Thankfully, I've always had good luck. For survival, luck is vital... and so is a willingness to take risks," he says.

In the mid-1950s he began devoting himself to the community, which included Israel Bonds, the school of Massuah, and Shaare Tzedek Hospital, the three charities with which he has become synonymous. For Grossman, Baycrest is a fundamental part of the community.

"I realized that in this country, you have to give back to society and that is the point when I started appreciating Canada," he says, having given back to every charity that has asked it of him. Baycrest was a recipient of his good will many times over with major gifts and fund-raising efforts he undertook to help the JHA and Baycrest Hospital develop and grow.

"I remember when I was a small boy in Poland, it was a Jewish custom every Friday evening before sundown for the lady of the house to deposit money in the charity box," he says.

Former Baycrest chair Edwin Goldstein says charity is a lesson Grossman learned well. "He's always been an outstanding fund-raiser for Baycrest. No one would ever refuse to give whatever Alex asked whenever he knocked at their door. He has been a great asset to Baycrest from the very beginning, both as a benefactor and in leading a team of fund-raisers to meet their necessary goals."

Al Hertz

I don't have a history of being involved in charity work as most of my time has been focused on business and family. I have visited people in hospitals and nursing homes over the years and though I hope never to have to be a resident, I feel that it's an important part of the community. My sister, Florence Brill, a former Baycrest Foundation board member, has been very involved in this area and she, as much as anybody, influenced me to make a contribution to Baycrest.

My mother-in-law had recently passed away and so I had considerable exposure to nursing care. I felt that not enough was being done to manage pain in elderly people who are unable to effectively communicate. You can't be positive about life when you're in pain, your whole personality changes. I've heard about morphine being administered to elderly people who were then taken off of it for fear they would become addicted. Worry about addiction in that kind of situation is questionable.

When Baycrest Foundation president Mark Gryfe suggested a fund to endow a clinical nurse specialist position for pain management, I was very pleased. So many elderly people are cognitively impaired and it's important to develop methods of identifying their pain as well as strategies for treating it. I'm delighted that the Al Hertz Family Foundation will ensure that Baycrest has an ongoing clinical position to teach pain management.

Morris and Sally Justein

Sally 1919 – 2004

The raison d'etre of the museum that bears their name is to nurture connections with Jewish heritage, and how appropriate that is. After all, Morris Justein and his late wife, Sally, have always embodied a deep passion for Jewish culture, heritage and values.

"The continuity of the Jewish people and Jewish values were all things that were important to my mother-in-law and she was also a very cultured woman who enjoyed museums," the Justeins' son-in law, Paul Austin, explains. "So my father-in-law and the panel at Baycrest together felt it would be a fitting tribute to honour my mother in-law with an endowment fund to support the Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum."

The Justeins became involved with Baycrest in the 1960s after relocating from North Bay to Toronto. In addition to his 50-year involvement with the Baycrest Men's Service Group, Morris was chair of the Honour Roll magazine for several years. "Morris likes to tell stories about how he would still need six or seven people to speak to in order to finalize the Honour Roll, and down to the wire, everyone would eventually come through," Austin relates.

Following the commendable example of her parents, the Justeins' daughter, Pamela Justein Austin, is now a major contributor at Baycrest, volunteering every week and being a member of the Women's Auxiliary board. "Baycrest was very much a focus of my father's social life," she says. "Today, Paul and I have also made many friends from our association with Baycrest."

Morris B. Kaufman

1911 – 1997

Morris Kaufman was a great friend to Baycrest. He was the quintessential fund-raiser – first in line to raise money for worthwhile endeavours from Jewish education to assisting the elderly in our community. "My dad's sincerity made him one of the most effective fund-raisers in Canada," son Ira enthuses. "It was hard to say no to him."

Morris Kaufman's passionate involvement in Baycrest was initiated in the '50s by his friend, Baycrest pioneer Abe Posluns. They accomplished much through their several decades of dedication to the elderly. Kaufman also forged a strong bond with Baycrest's then CEO, Sam Ruth, and was a founding member of the Sam Ruth Legacy Society – a planned giving program of the Baycrest Foundation.

"Morris felt it was of utmost importance to help the community," his wife, Rose, says. "He was passionately involved in raising much-needed dollars for causes he believed in. Baycrest definitely pulled at his heartstrings."

Indeed, Kaufman worked many fund-raising miracles for Baycrest. He insured that during his lifetime and thereafter Baycrest would continue to reap the benefits of his generosity as well as the generosity of those he inspired.

Daniel E. Kert

1926 – 1988

People seem to agree on one thing about Daniel Kert: he was a man who was larger than life. Described by friends and family as a man of prodigious energy and enthusiasm, he brought that passion to bear in his involvement at Baycrest.

Kert never worried about rolling up his sleeves and getting down to work. He was a "candy striper mechanic," at times manning the boilers of Baycrest's forerunner, the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home. He was an organizer of the Men's Service Group and when Baycrest Hospital was in the planning stages, he raised funds for the new facility. Kert was named Man of the Year by the Men's Service Group in 1964, and was its president from 1966 to 1967. He was not only an enthusiastic fund-raiser but also a generous donor. The Daniel E. Kert Foundation honours his commitment and caring for the elderly.

"My father had a zest for life like no other person," son Roey Kert says, who like his father is a Baycrest contributor. "My father had health problems throughout his life, but he never let that stop him from doing anything, including being an active sportsman," he explains.

"Daniel was very enthusiastic about Baycrest," says Edwin Goldstein, a former chair of the Baycrest and Baycrest Foundation boards. "He got me involved in 1968 for the building of the new hospital." In fact, one of Kert's strengths was his ability to bring new, young people into the Baycrest organization. No surprise, then, that his grandson Daniel chose to fulfill part of his community service by working at Baycrest.

Murray and Lila Kirsh

The best birthday present I ever got was marrying Lila the day before I turned 21 and I feel that except for that decision the best choice I ever made was when I chose to give my time. You can't just take from your community; you also have to give something back. I decided to put my efforts toward helping my synagogue, Adath Israel, and Baycrest.

Lila started her volunteer service at Baycrest as a receptionist in its first beauty shop and also became a life member of the Women's Auxiliary. My first memories of Baycrest come from my childhood when my maternal grandmother was a resident of the Cecil Street home and I would come and sit with her.

I've been volunteering at Baycrest for almost 50 years in various capacities and have created, emceed and chaired many fund-raisers that have benefitted Baycrest, such as the Honour Roll magazine, the Fun Run and numerous others. I have also been singing and performing with some of my associates over the past 50 years, with all proceeds going to Baycrest. Presently, I head up a preventive maintenance program for the physical plant department.

With three children, and their spouses, and five grandchildren, we've tried to pass our values on to the next generations. There is currently an Issie and Annie Feldman Endowment Fund in memory of Lila's parents and we have recently established a special gift fund in honour of our 60th wedding anniversary.

The lesson our faith teaches us is that what we do counts. It certainly helped to shape who we are.

Mel Lastman

Described by many as "a man of the people, who sticks up for the little guy," there is no one Mel Lastman sticks up for more than the elderly. As the world's longest serving mayor of a major city (of North York from 1972 to 1997 and then of the amalgamated Toronto until 2003), he oversaw many initiatives that improved life for seniors.

Lastman, who holds an honorary doctorate of laws degree from York University and a Humanitarian of the Year Award, is the founder of the Bad Boy chain of appliance stores. His association with Baycrest is long-standing.

"As a boy," he says, "I used to deliver produce from my grandparents' store in Kensington Market to the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home and later my grandfather lived at Baycrest."

In the 1970s, Lastman conducted a plebiscite in North York that empowered him to levy a special tax of one mill rate to raise funds for capital projects for hospitals. Money from this fund contributed to the building of the new Baycrest Hospital in 1983.

"Mr. Lastman was a great supporter of that project," says Edwin Goldstein, chair of the building campaign at that time, "and a great supporter of Baycrest."

Lastman also chaired the Men's Service Group Honour Roll magazine for five years, launched the MSG annual telethon and appeared at countless Baycrest events, even modelling in a fashion show, which he remembers as a lot of fun.

"When I was mayor, people would come to our office from all over the world and one of the first things they'd ask about was Baycrest," Lastman says. "They wanted to learn more about it and about the care it provided. Baycrest is a great place because seniors there are treated with respect."

Sidney Lax

My nephew Clifford Lax was quite active in Baycrest and I told him one time that when I retire, I would probably be a volunteer there. I retired at the age of 70 and I kept my word. As a bachelor, I had to keep busy and Baycrest was an organization that I felt was helping the elderly, so it was a good idea to choose it as a place to volunteer.

I started as a member of the Men's Service Group and remained there until not too long ago. One activity I had a great time at was the Fun Run. We used to take care of the clothes belonging to people in the run and as soon as they crossed the finish line, we would return their clothes to them.

I also joined a few other volunteers to hand-deliver the Honour Roll to different homes and businesses. When I wasn't doing deliveries, I would be on the computer, updating the lists of the mailing addresses for Honour Roll recipients. I also used to go to Sunday brunches at Baycrest where some of the residents couldn't feed themselves. We would help them eat and it's such a pleasant feeling to help people sit down and have a meal.

Baycrest is a fantastic institution and I enjoyed every minute of the time I was there. It's what kept me young and if I could be there now, I would.

Murray and Adrienne Levinter

Long-standing volunteers Murray and Adrienne Levinter share a deep love for Baycrest, which they share with everyone they meet.

The Levinters have been married for 53 years. Adrienne joined Baycrest as a volunteer in 1968, then was hired by the volunteer services department as program co-ordinator from 1970 to 1985. After retirement, she remained active in client programs and served as chair of the gift shop committee. She also was vice president of the Women's Auxiliary board of directors and is still an active board member today.

Murray became a volunteer in 1983, after his retirement from the furniture business. He served as the Men's Service Group (MSG) secretary, worked on the Honour Roll, was very involved with the campaign to build the new Baycrest Hospital, and received the MSG President's Award in 1988. He is also an active member of Beth Tzedec Synagogue and received their President's Award in 1985.

The couple's concern for others is well-known. They delivered Meals on Wheels for many years and always took time to visit with clients, because these interactions, they felt, were just as important as the nourishment the food provided.

"We believe that listening to people is one of the most important things volunteers can do," they say.

The Levinters have won many government awards and were the first couple to receive the Community Award from the Primrose Club. One of their favourite volunteer jobs at Baycrest has been to lead countless tour groups through the facility.

"People come from all over the world to see Baycrest," they say, "and it's thrilling to show them what we've accomplished, especially in research and client care. Just being part of that growth is so rewarding. The whole Jewish community should be so proud of Baycrest."

Michael S. Levy

I lost my parents relatively early in life. My father, Jack Levy, died young and after his death my mother, Sophie Levy, became active in Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary. She passed away in 1973 and that ended my early connection with Baycrest.

Years later, David Goldstein and Stan Feldman asked me to join the Baycrest Foundation board. I agreed, feeling that volunteering would be a way to reconnect with memories of my mother. Then, Sam Ruth asked me to chair the communications committee for the 1995 capital campaign. I was busy developing my business and I was also serving as the fund-raising chairperson of Bialik Hebrew Day School. Sam said, "Don't worry; it's only one meeting a month." Well, one meeting quickly grew into twelve! But I've absolutely loved being a board member. I've met wonderful people, had lots of fun, and most importantly been able to contribute in a small way to the success of the greatest geriatric centre in the world. I've really enjoyed the Barrie to Baycrest 100-kilometre bike ride – I've done it nine times. It's an annual challenge I eagerly look forward to.

I've been involved in many facets of the organization. I've co-chaired the 2003 and 2004 annual campaigns with Molline Green and currently, I'm the chair of the endowment committee. I wanted to create a lasting link to Baycrest for my wife, Caren, and my daughters, Sara and Alissa, so we decided to open an endowment fund. Through the fund, my family will continue the work I have been doing for an institution that means the world to me.

Irwin Lightman

Dentistry may not have been an obvious career choice for a young Jewish man graduating from the University of Toronto in 1946, but luckily for thousands of seniors, including many Baycrest clients, it was the right choice for Dr. Irwin Lightman.

Dentistry, like many other professions at the time, was rife with anti-Semitism when Lightman, the second youngest child of Sarah and Sam Lightman, opted to pursue the unlikely occupation in spite of its anti-Jewish reputation. "Dentistry was simply not viewed as a viable option for Jews in those days," he recalls. "I graduated from the U of T's faculty of dentistry by keeping a low profile and avoiding too much contact with students, professors and a notoriously anti-Semitic dean of dentistry. It was an unpopular choice but it ended up making for a very interesting life."

It wasn't long after opening his own practice at Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue West, that Lightman, who married Selma Vise the same year he graduated, began to volunteer at the dental clinic at Mount Sinai Hospital. "We did some very crude work in the equipment storage room but we helped a lot of people," he notes.

Having met Dr. Reuben Brown, Baycrest's first volunteer chief of dentistry, while still in university, Lightman, sharing Brown's compassion for the elderly, was more than pleased to join him as a volunteer at the clinic in 1954.

Lightman volunteered at the clinic for more than 26 years, eventually taking over from Brown as chief, and overseeing 15 other volunteer dentists. "I've always cared about the elderly," he adds. "They are easy to get along with."

Fran Mann

1933 – 2006

It might have been the warm, caring style that endeared everyone to Fran Mann or it may have been her ever approachable and gentle manner, but whatever it was, it affected everyone who knew her in the most wonderful way.

Soon after Mann became a resident of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged (JHA), she became involved in the worries of those around her. She was appointed president of the residents' advisory council where she served for four years as a great leader and advocate for residents' issues.

On her regular rounds, the elegant, exquisitely dressed and beautifully coiffed stateswoman made her presence known by engaging with residents over any concerns they needed to voice. She would then work with management to resolve their issues. Even at the beginning of her lengthy illness, Mann managed to conduct the council's business from her bed.

One of her major accomplishments during her presidency was the initiation of an open forum for JHA residents. It attracted over 150 people who came to voice their opinions on changes and priorities. She facilitated the Q & A that followed and then proactively followed-up, tracking responses and improvements over time.

In June of 2005, she was asked to speak at Baycrest's annual general meeting. The first annual Baycrest Boardwalk fund-raiser followed the meeting and Mann, representing the residents, raised a remarkable $2,000.

Always a master problem solver, Mann never failed to give quick praise to those deserving of the honour. Her accomplishments during her few short years at Baycrest have left a lasting impression for years to come.

Helen Marr

My career as a Baycrest volunteer was a learning experience of a lifetime. Our deep-seated views and concepts of aging have changed over the past decades, as have aging and the elderly. The elderly of today are, generally speaking, healthier and more vibrant than in previous generations. This is as a result of health maintenance, physical activity and mental stimulation. Of course, modern science and medicine are also factors. My 92-year-old mother, Faye Albert, is a prime example... she is a volunteer saleswoman at the Baycrest gift shop!

Baycrest was, and still is, constantly evolving. I first became involved with Baycrest at the suggestion of my friends, Eric and Esther Exton. At that time, the Women's Auxiliary (WA) was in the process of re-organization. I was asked to share my expertise, which I had gleaned through volunteer work with other organizations and, in particular, the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada. It was an exciting time, and my involvement eventually expanded beyond the WA to the advisory committees of the JHA, Wagman Centre, Terrace, and admissions department, all of which I chaired for several years. As well, I was a vice president of Baycrest at a time when the executive and board were predominately male. This has changed. We see more and more women in leadership positions. Hopefully, I contributed to this, through raising awareness of the importance of the roles women play in today's society.

During my travels as president of the International Council of Jewish Women, I visited centres for geriatric care worldwide, where experiences were shared. Baycrest was, and is, held in the highest regard. It was a privilege and an honour to have had Baycrest play such an important part in my life!

Geoffrey Matus

My grandparents, Leah and Nonnie Fihrer, were wonderful people who had an enormous influence on my life. So, in 1985, when Baycrest past chairs, Norman Schipper and Stephen Cole asked me to join the Baycrest Foundation board of directors, I was happy to join an organization that serves the elderly. I had looked at various institutions and Baycrest seemed like a place where volunteers played an important role.

From the moment I came to Baycrest I knew I had made the right choice. I'm not a religious person, but Jewish values – particularly respect and care for the elderly – are very important to me and I am pleased that my daughters, Lauren and Hayley, saw me volunteering for a wonderful and consummately Jewish organization.

My first major role at Baycrest was to chair the fund-raising committee for The Rotman Research Institute, which focuses on the brain. In 1989, I was elected to the Baycrest board of directors. I then chaired a committee that developed Baycrest's mission to enrich the lives of the elderly. From 2001 to 2004, I served as chair of the board of directors.

My interest at the Rotman gave me an important initiation into issues of neurocognition and mental health and taught me about the debilitating brain disorders that have affected so many elderly people. These issues present a significant challenge to the community and influenced me greatly when I was asked to chair the committee for Baycrest's new strategic plan. When I became board chair, we instituted a vision that focuses on brain health and the need to integrate research, care and education. I truly believe that that vision was transformative for Baycrest.

Miriam Minkowski
1926 – 2004

For Holocaust survivor Miriam Minkowski, working as a practical nurse at Baycrest was much more than a job. It became her link to the Jewish world and the family she lost as a young child.

Born in Augustowka, Poland in 1926, Minkowski was just 13 years old when the onslaught of the Holocaust forced her parents, Aaron and Henia Fledermaus, to send their young daughter into hiding. One year later, she was callously exposed by a former school teacher and immediately sent to Ravensbruck labour camp and then on to Buchenwald and Schlieben.

After the war, she eagerly returned to her home town only to find all her family gone. Two years later, while working at a newspaper in Lodz, she met and married Gershon Minkowski and later gave birth to their two daughters, Anne and Jeanie. They moved to Israel in 1957, and three years later immigrated to Toronto where she worked in a factory as a caterer before becoming a practical nurse at Baycrest in 1966.

"She went back to school and became the best nurse she could be," eldest daughter Anne Balaban says while recalling her mother's deep dedication and strong desire to give back in spite of having had so much taken away. "She even chose where we would live by its proximity to Baycrest," she muses.

As one of the few nurses who spoke fluent Yiddish, Polish and Hebrew, Minkowski became known among staff and patients as The Interpreter during the 25 years she spent at Baycrest before retiring in 1991.

"What started as a job out of sheer necessity resulted in a life full of mitzvahs," Anne explains. " At Baycrest she finally found the Jewish life for which she had always yearned."

Faye Mintz

My mother taught us to help others. It was a rule we all favoured and obeyed and one that my husband and I taught to our five children, as well.

I have been a volunteer in many Jewish organizations, including many years with Hadassah WIZO. But my greatest effort and reward has been with Baycrest, where I have dedicated 40 years of time and energy without ever regretting a minute of it.

You might say that my main focus at Baycrest was in the field of entertainment because every Monday our group of volunteers would bring patients down to the sun room for two hours of raucous singing in Hebrew, English and, of course, Yiddish. Patients and residents alike loved what they called The Singing Group even though on one occasion a patient seated next to me asked if I would move because my voice "didn't sound so good."

Once a year we performed in the Posluns Auditorium for all of the patients and residents and they loved it.

I remember when a Maple Downs Golf and Country Club member donated a day at the club for Baycrest residents, many of whom were in wheelchairs or pushing walkers. That didn't deter anybody. We all helped to get anyone who wanted to take a dip, into the pool. They got to swim, eat, soak up some sun and return to the home later that day with incredible joy in their hearts.

I have many beautiful plaques and lots of incredible memories from the past 40 years but nothing beats the thrill of putting a smile on the face or receiving a kiss on the hand from a grateful patient or resident.

Florence Minz

Baycrest was going through an organizational transition when I first became involved in the late 1980s, initially as a consultant and then as a board member. As a consultant, I had the opportunity to help recruit Stephen W. Herbert as the first president and CEO, a fortunate event for Baycrest.

In 1990, I was asked to join the Baycrest board of directors. I remained on the board for a decade, from 1991 to 2001. From 1995 to 1998, I had the great honour of becoming board chair.

It was a time of many new initiatives in homecare and outreach. The need for a new nursing home had become urgent and I had a role in expediting the building of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged. I was also proud to advance the cause of research as a prime element of Baycrest's work, and helped to counter arguments that investment in research reduced resources for care. I always felt that the two areas supported and enhanced each other, and it is clear that Baycrest's achievements in both have been significant.

The quality of its individuals is perhaps the most crucial element in any organization's success,and it is gratifying to have been able to involve a number of people who have taken leadership roles at Baycrest.

Baycrest is an outstanding organization and it has been a privilege to be a part of it.

Nicholas and Hedy Munk

Nicholas 1900 – 1985

As he cared for his elderly father in the mid-1950s, Nicholas Munk saw firsthand that there was need for a Jewish seniors centre. With this understanding, he gladly and passionately became a supporter of Baycrest. "My uncle saw that it was difficult to get help and assistance for the elderly back then and that's what made him realize there was really a need for Baycrest," his nephew, Dr. Paul Munk, says. "So in those early years of Baycrest, he was very involved in helping to organize fund-raising."

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Nicholas Munk was a committed Baycrest volunteer, helping to garner a solid financial base for the centre, as well as ensure its growth. "He spent huge amounts of time on the executive committee making sure Baycrest was going to thrive," Paul notes.

An engineer by trade, Nicholas was both a creative thinker and businessman and he brought these talents to Baycrest. To that end, in 1978, he established the Nicholas M. and Hedy J. Munk Geriatric Award to encourage physicians – particularly younger ones – to pursue a specialty in geriatric medicine. "It was a very insightful idea at the time because most of the doctors who did research on older patients were older doctors themselves," Paul says. "His goal was to try and attract younger physicians to the field."

Fortunately, Nicholas was able to see the impact of the fund during his lifetime and Paul says it made him immensely proud. "It was his way of giving back to the community and he felt very satisfied knowing it would help people now and down the road."

Nancy Posluns

I get quite a thrill when I walk Baycrest halls and see a picture of my maternal grandmother as one of the founding members and early officers of the home on Cecil Street. My father and brother were both presidents of the Jewish Home for the Aged in Buffalo and I'm very proud of my late husband Jack Posluns' family and of their long involvement with Baycrest.

So when Sheila Loftus asked me to be her co-chair for the Women's Auxiliary café committee, volunteering with the elderly was not exactly a big stretch. In 1986, I heard Dr. Guy Proulx speak to the Women's Auxiliary. He mentioned that Baycrest's psychology department had a backlog of people with brain disorders who required assessment. My background was in psychology so it was a wonderful fit for me.

My volunteer work at Baycrest has allowed me to be involved in cutting-edge research that is life changing for people with severe memory problems. I have worked closely with Dr. Brian Richards on his innovative Memory-Link program, which involves training our clients to use Palm Pilots as external memory devices. This exciting breakthrough program has given new independence to many of our patients with amnesia.

It's been 20 years since I first started to volunteer in the department and I have learned so much from the remarkable people with whom I work. I feel a great sense of humility and pride at being given this wonderful opportunity.

Winnie Posner

My parents, Jack and Libbie Sandy, were two dedicated volunteers who instilled in me the idea that it was important to give back. And so, more than 40 years ago when my children were in their early teens, I took a stroll up the street to sign on as a Baycrest volunteer.

I started as a spokesperson for Busy Hands, an arts and crafts program which turned out to be somewhat ironic since I had never displayed much skill at either. Eventually, I was given a new assignment where I spent several glorious years at the welcome desk.

My enthusiasm seemed to infect my late husband, Sam, who upon his retirement joined the army of Baycrest volunteers as a tour guide.

My most rewarding experience came when Sonny Langer, as head of the volunteer core, approached me and two other women to train with the Red Cross to lead a fitness program for Baycrest seniors. That program continues to this day. In December of 2006 I'll be 89, and I still get out there to help lead the exercise sessions. My legs aren't what they used to be, so now I do the lower body exercises while seated in a chair. We have this wonderful musician who plays these great old songs for us, and that really keeps us inspired and moving.

At this stage of my life, I'm happiest when I get a hug from a Baycrest resident. That can always put a smile on my face. The odd thing, though, is I'll bet I'm older than many of the people I help. I hope I can continue for many years to come.

Gerald Ray

1926 – 2001

Gerald Ray was a high-powered executive who dedicated over 10 years to the betterment of Baycrest.

As CEO of Bordens Canada and president of the Grocery Product Manufacturing Association of Canada, he was able to bring a dynamic corporate perspective to the Baycrest board.

Norman Schipper remembers Ray as a decent, intelligent and caring fellow. "He never failed to show up at meetings, bringing with him the zeal of a successful executive," he says.

Edwin Goldstein remembers Ray joining the search committee to find a replacement for Sam Ruth, the Baycrest CEO and Baycrest Foundation president fondly referred to as Mr. Baycrest. "It was probably the toughest job anyone could have been asked to do at that time," Goldstein says.

Ray's interest in Baycrest was initially galvanized when his father, Isaac, became a resident in the early '70s and continued after his mother, Molly, moved into the home some 10 years later.

With his main focus on resident care, he poured his efforts into helping Baycrest establish a hospital.

Ray's son, Keith, describes his father as a visionary who told him, "You have to use your creativity and then take a chance. I always encouraged the board to start with big dreams and big aspirations and I assured them that if they did, the money would follow."

It was Gerald Ray's corporate know how that made him such a treasured member of the Baycrest board, encouraging everyone he worked with to stretch their imagination as far as possible to achieve any goal they set.

Irving Rife

1910 – 2003

During each of the 30 years that Irving Rife dedicated to Baycrest's Jewish Home for the Aged, those around him were rewarded with his keen, uninhibited sense of humour as well as his conviction and commitment to the place he loved.

Rife was not a shy man but he was a humble man. He worked tirelessly, never looking for kudos but still earning countless awards for his generosity and dedication to Baycrest.

On the Men's Service Group board he worked to revitalize the Honour Roll magazine; a fund-raising asset that put a quarter of a million dollars into Baycrest annually.

In 1976, he received the MSG President's Award, and in 1979, he was Man of the Year.

People of all ethnic backgrounds came from all corners of the globe to see and learn about Baycrest, and Rife was always the consummate tour guide. To him it was a journey of pride and pleasure. He regaled visitors with stories of Baycrest's memorable history and hopeful future. He never tired of praising Baycrest as the most advanced centre for geriatrics in the world.

Rife passed away during Purim in 2003. His daughter, Reva Garber, acknowledges the irony in that fact, saying, "He would have found it strangely appropriate to pass on during a time of such fun and festivities."

Rife's family is enormously proud of his 30-year commitment to Baycrest and they hope others will benefit in the future from his untiring efforts of the past.

Gerald Ross

I believe we all have to give back to the community and it's especially gratifying to give back to something that gives so much to us.

My initial involvement goes back at least a dozen years, when my late brother-in-law, Harold Lederman, was vice-chair of the Baycrest Foundation. I was also connected through my late mother-in-law, Elsie Lederman, who was a long-time resident.

On the Baycrest Foundation's board, my functions were largely in two areas – fund-raising and organizational. I have also chaired the foundation's governance committee for a number of years. Just to see the efficient way the organization operates, has made that role most gratifying.

I'm now co-chair of the foundation's professional advisory committee. The committee's aim is to develop a program that reaches out to professionals, raising their awareness of Baycrest and bringing them to the facility to see the scope of the work Baycrest does. So far, it's proven to be successful.

Whenever possible, I try to be an ambassador for Baycrest. I try to raise awareness of what Baycrest is and how it's a fascinating place providing a unique blend of both research expertise and clinical care. Things are changing all the time at Baycrest and the lay people who serve on the foundation board with me are remarkable. The staff is also outstanding. Having hopefully contributed to the ongoing success of Baycrest is the satisfaction that I get from it.

Steve Rudin

When you work for Baycrest, it's a unique experience because it's not just a job, it's a lifestyle. You get so immersed in what you're doing that it really becomes inseparable from the rest of your life.

The Baycrest lifestyle started for me in 1970. I was finishing graduate school in Missouri at the time when then CEO Sam Ruth asked me to come work for him as the assistant administrator of the hospital. I came up for an interview and felt there was something rather magical about Baycrest and Toronto, so my pregnant wife and I decided Baycrest would be the place.

One thing led to another and over time I received more responsibility, eventually becoming the administrator of the hospital. Then in 1980, Sam indicated that he wanted to start the Baycrest Foundation. He asked if I would apply, I did, and the rest, as they say, is history.

One of the highlights of my experience was the construction of the new hospital. To take this idea from being a concept to a reality was really gratifying. We were able to create some innovative programs and apply the whole notion of providing the continuum of care for the elderly.

During my tenure, we were also able to launch the beginning of The Rotman Research Institute and gain a foothold with the University of Toronto through our teaching affiliation. Both of these developments brought Baycrest to a significantly different level.

In reflecting on my 18 years at Baycrest, it was a privilege and a rewarding experience to be a part of Baycrest's growth.

Sam Ruth
1921 – 2006

My 44 years of service to Baycrest began in 1956 when I became chief executive officer of Baycrest. It was the start of a life-long commitment that would become a labour of love.

While working as a hospital administrator in Cleveland after marrying Nancy in 1952, I saw that many patients, especially the elderly, weren't receiving the level of care they deserved. That's when I became committed to long-term care.

After the good fortune of meeting Abe Posluns and sharing his vision of better care for the elderly, I realized Baycrest would be the place where I could make a difference.

Each year we accomplished so much thanks to the exceptional people I worked with, including elected presidents Abe Posluns, Abe Levine, Eric Exton, Norman Schipper, Fred Karp, and Edwin Goldstein, as well as dedicated board members and compassionate volunteers. Listening to people and working as a team really paid off.

In 1968, we built the new Jewish Home for the Aged and a few years later, Baycrest Hospital. Realizing there were people who needed protection but were not yet ready for the home, we built the Terrace in 1974. There was always something going on at Baycrest. We were always trying to improve care, as well as develop education and research programs.

When I turned 59, I felt I had contributed administratively what I could for Baycrest, so I became the founding president of the Baycrest Foundation. Even though I officially retired in 1990, I continue to support Baycrest wherever and whenever needed.

I am proud of helping to develop a level of care that addresses the needs of the elderly at every stage of their life and of being a part of a long history of caring and compassionate people that have made Baycrest the international leader in health care it has become.

Benjamin Sadowski
1894 – 1974

If you haven't heard of Massey, Ontario, all you need to know is that is where community philanthropist Ben Sadowski was born.

As a youth, Sadowski headed for Toronto to attend Parkdale high school where he won a scholarship he couldn't claim because he was a Jew. Several years later, he graduated from the University of Toronto with a degree in mathematics and physics.

In 1927, he formed National Motors, which became the main source of his business success. Later, he had the distinct honour of serving as the first Jewish president of the Automobile Dealers Association of Canada.

A born leader, Sadowski was the first president of the Toronto Jewish Welfare Fund, which became the UJA, and a founder of the Red Feather Community Chest, which became the United Way.

In 1954, as the first president of the New Mount Sinai Hospital, he initiated a joint agreement with Baycrest that obligated every doctor on staff at the New Mount Sinai to work at Baycrest, firmly laying the foundation for the new Baycrest Hospital.

During his lifetime, he was president of Holy Blossom Temple, Jewish Family and Child Services, Oakdale Golf and Country Club and the Ontario branch of the Canadian Jewish Congress. He also served on the boards of the Toronto Symphony, The YMHA, Canadian Red Cross, and Princess Margaret Hospital. He also contributed to the creation of Brandeis University.

From a rugged small town minority to an internationally renowned, ground-breaking leader, Ben Sadowski's journey was a gift to us all.

Marvin and Ruth Sadowski
Ruth 1932 – 2006

I never set out to get involved with Baycrest. It actually happened quite by accident. When they were opening the Terrace, they needed someone to coordinate the whole thing, so Eph Diamond asked me to help and I simply couldn't refuse. I saw what was going on there and fell in love with the place and I've been involved ever since.

Due to my enthusiasm, my wife, Ruth, became involved with the Women's Auxiliary. We started participating in the Baycrest walk and run many years ago. Even our children walked with us every year. That project evolved into the Baycrest Boardwalk, which has become a very successful annual event.

In another type of commitment, we established the Marvin and Ruth-Fine Sadowski Family Endowment Fund that allows considerable dollars to be used for Baycrest's general needs.

I began on the house committee, became a member of the board and then chairman of the board. As chair, I sat on the advisory committee for The Rotman Research Institute. I was also involved in the creation of the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community. But my most favourite undertaking was as co-chair of the building committee for the outstanding Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged.

Looking back, I'd have to say that one of my most treasured experiences was the day Steve Herbert took me on a tour of Baycrest. I was amazed at the things I saw, like the repair centre for wheelchairs and the amazingly futuristic kitchen.

After all the years of building and creating and doing, the reputation Baycrest enjoys worldwide for its geriatrics is remarkable.

Every day, my continuing admiration for Baycrest and my conviction that it is a campus run by staff and volunteer angels is reconfirmed.

Saul and Rae Saltzman

Saul 1903 – 1989, Rae 1910 – 2002

Saul and Rae Saltzman had a fulfilling life together, their daughters say. Saul was born in an impoverished shtetl and left Poland and his family at the age of 14. He developed a thriving business in Canada, Solray Investments, which the couple named after their union. They measured their success not so much by their financial achievements but by the flourishing family they and their three daughters – Roz Halbert, Eleanor Godfrey and Marilyn Gold – created, and in the work they did for the Jewish community.

The Saltzmans were long-time supporters of Baycrest and after Saul's passing, Rae established an endowment fund which supports the Saul and Rae Saltzman Day Treatment Centre. A self-contained unit in Baycrest Hospital, the centre provides outpatient services to elderly people living in the community who are facing challenges in their daily life. "The program is geared to helping people maintain their independence," centre intake co-ordinator Delia Silva says. "Our multidisciplinary team is very flexible and we respect the uniqueness of each person." Apart from the pleasure of watching people improve in functioning and mood, Silva enjoys seeing people form social connections in the program, particularly those who have previously felt isolated.

"Our mother was a quiet, petite woman with a strong mind," Halbert and Godfrey relate with pride. At the centre's dedication ceremony in 1991, Godfrey saluted her mother's devotion to the project, whose birth was "a combination of Dad's financial success, the family's commitment to the community and Mom's desire to link the family name to this world-renowned institution."

Graham Scott

As the deputy minister of health, I had many dealings with Baycrest's former CEO Sam Ruth and I had a great deal of respect for him. So when he asked if I would be interested in being involved with Baycrest, I happily agreed.

I was subsequently appointed to the Baycrest board of governors in the mid-1980s and then when Joe Rotman established The Rotman Research Institute, I was asked to join that board. I remained on the board until a short while ago.

One of the very first projects we had was gaining recognition as a teaching hospital through our affiliation with the University of Toronto. That was very important recognition because it helped advance the Rotman from a situation where it had little, to being a leader in research, able to attract first-class researchers from across the world.

I was also proud to be part of the team that engaged in matters relating to strategy for dealings with the federal and provincial governments, as well as other health institutions. This was particularly meaningful to me because it reflected part of my own background in government. Furthermore, being on the board and the research advisory committee meant I was involved with a dynamic group of people who had such high levels of energy and commitment. I learned a lot from them.

Baycrest was kind enough to do an assessment on my late mother, Winifred, and the quality of care she received at Baycrest Hospital was very impressive. It made me enormously proud to have played the minor role I did over the years.

Sid Seligman

1917 – 1985

Sid Seligman was the kind of person who probably would have found this type of tribute a bit embarrassing. Throughout his lifetime, he helped countless people but always in a quiet, unassuming way.

Seligman was born in Toronto and went to Harbord Collegiate Institute. He married his wife, Merle, in 1939, and in 1944, he joined the Dominion Life Assurance Company in sales and management under the leadership of Herbert Weiss, who, in 1955, founded the Men's Service Group (MSG) at Baycrest.

Seligman's Jewish heritage was very important to him, especially the value of giving to others. He had grown up knowing about Baycrest and was also aware of it through his wife's family. Her mother and great-aunt were members of the Ezras Nashim Society, which founded Baycrest's forerunner, the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home on Cecil Street. When Weiss asked him to join the MSG, it was a natural step. During subsequent decades of service, Seligman served as president from 1964 to 1966, and received their Man of the Year Award in 1971.

At Dominion Life, he received numerous awards for his personal achievements and leadership qualities. On his retirement in 1977, the company donated a blood pressure unit to Baycrest Hospital, knowing how important the organization was to him. His friends at the insurance company described him as a man of radiant personality who affected all those with whom he came in contact.

Seligman was also president of the Toronto chapter of B'nai Brith and he and his wife were active in Maple Downs Golf and Country Club.

"He was a giver and always very generous," his wife says. "He did so many things for so many people and never blew his own horn."

Bernard J. Shapiro
1920 – 1996

The Yiddish word beshert, which refers to something that is meant to be, best describes the special connection between pioneering geriatric radiologist Dr. Bernard J. Shapiro and Baycrest, which lasted for more than 40 years.

In 1955, the McGill medical school graduate, who was working as chief of radiology at London, Ontario's Westminster Hospital, was passing through Toronto when he dropped into the New Mount Sinai Hospital to take a quick peek at the facility's new radiology department. Soon after, he became the hospital's first full-time chief of radiology.

A few months later, close friend and Baycrest CEO Sam Ruth persuaded Shapiro to help design Baycrest's radiology department. He eagerly accepted the position of founding chief of radiology on a volunteer basis, beginning his more than 40 years of service to Baycrest.

"If it had to do with helping people, especially Jewish seniors, Bernie Shapiro was up for the job," close colleague and friend Irving Fisher says. "Bernie was one of the most feeling people I have ever known. He always made a point of looking at situations from the patient's point of view."

Shapiro, who continued to work at Baycrest until he died in 1996 at age 76, was drawn to all aspects of medicine but loved the human interaction most. In 1980, when Terrace residents got together to organize a Reform congregation, Shapiro happily agreed to lead services, which he did on Friday evenings for more than 10 years. He and his wife, Pearl, even purchased and donated many of the congregation's prayer books.

"My father loved medicine, healing and learning about the latest technology and that's why he stayed involved with Baycrest for so long," his son, Rabbi Mark Shapiro, explains. "But most of all he really enjoyed being around seniors."

Lorraine Sherkin

When I look back over my 35-year association with Baycrest, I consider this time to be some of the most meaningful years of my life. I began my Baycrest Years as a volunteer in the 1960s. Sam Ruth asked me to help co-ordinate the move to the new Jewish Home for the Aged and my career was launched.

That move took a year to complete and my natural love for connecting with people was infused with another one of my passions: continuous learning. During my years at Baycrest, I also trained at the Canadian National Institute for the Blind to assist our blind residents. My fluency in Yiddish allowed me to be of assistance as a translator and I was one of the first support staff to take courses in dementia care.

When the Terrace opened in 1976, I was asked to co-ordinate that move, as well. Not only did I work hard to ensure a smooth transition, I also was responsible for organizing a team of volunteers to help residents feel at home and welcome. In 1978, I was hired as full-time staff.

My work was both satisfying and rewarding. I treated each and every resident as though they were a member of my family. It wasn't unusual for me to check in on sick residents, often bringing a warm cup of tea. I accompanied residents to doctors' offices to translate and reassure. I also made sure every woman received a rose on Mother's Day. In later years, I took over the co-ordination of special functions and managed the Terrace convenience store.

Much as I loved my work and helping to enrich residents' lives, I know that it was my life that was enriched and made better by my time at the Terrace

Hy and Bertha Shore
Hy 1919 – 1985, Bertha 1922 – 1989

Hy and Bertha Shore were simply the most generous people you could ever know, says Harry Gorman, brother to Bertha and best friend to Hy. The Shores lived along the edge of a ravine and since their door was always open for a meal to whoever happened to come by, even wild animals occasionally dropped in for a bite.

"Hy was the kind of guy who was always in the background, working quietly to help out any organization," Gorman remembers. "He was an engineer and a partner in the real estate business with Ben Katz and me, so his first volunteer project at Baycrest was in the field of construction." Along with Sydney Cooper, Shore helped to supervise the building of Baycrest Hospital and it was Shore and Gorman who influenced Ben and Hilda Katz to make a substantial contribution to the hospital, which now bears their name.

Harry and Bertha's mother was a resident at the Baycrest Terrace, which left the Shores with special feelings for Baycrest because of the excellent care she received. Involved for many years with the Women's Auxiliary, Bertha also received treatment at Baycrest Hospital.

The Hy and Bertha Shore and Harry and Sara Gorman Scholarship Endowment Fund was established in the spirit of their lifestyle. "Hy wanted to help mid-level staff at Baycrest develop professionally," Gorman recalls. "He mixed with bank managers as well as lay builders and it was important to him to advance people like those who treated our mother." Since its inauguration, the fund has helped more than 50 staff members enhance their knowledge.

Coleman Solursh

1906 – 1988

Dr. Coleman Solursh, Baycrest's former physician-in-chief, was born in Toronto in 1906 into an orthodox Jewish family. He graduated from U of T medical school in 1931 with honours and took his medical internship in Pittsburgh because Toronto's general hospitals had quotas for Jewish students. After graduation, he returned to Toronto to practise.

Jewish doctors during the Great Depression worked for the landsmanshaften, societies of immigrants from Eastern Europe. A physician was given a small head fee to provide medical care on a 24/7 basis to its members. "It was one of my father's proudest accomplishments," son John says, "that he broke free from this system and started to serve patients in the broader community."

Solursh was involved in the establishment of the original Mount Sinai Hospital where he was active throughout the 1940s. Mount Sinai ensured Jewish doctors could have hospital privileges. He was heavily involved in the planning of the New Mount Sinai Hospital, becoming its first chief of staff of family medicine.

Solursh became involved with Baycrest in the 1950s, becoming its associate chief of medical services in 1967. He had always been drawn to geriatrics and understood the special challenges in this growing field. As physician-in-chief, he stressed that it was not only the scientific skill of the doctor but also his rapport with patients that was important for a good result.

"He was forward thinking in that sense," John says, "yet old fashioned in that he made housecalls long after other doctors stopped. For years after he passed away, his former patients would tell me how much they valued him, because he knew their families so well."

Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services at Baycrest, remembers him as "always a gentleman, meaning especially the gentleness of care. He was a true friend of Baycrest."

Lou Stillman

During my many decades of active volunteer work, I have been involved in every aspect of Baycrest volunteerism from conducting Passover seders to working on those popular Wednesday variety programs of the past.

You could say I chose volunteerism as my hobby because it's fulfilling for everyone. You give a little of your time and you get back so much in satisfaction.

Baycrest has changed a lot in the 40 years since I started volunteering there. I remember when it was much smaller, the Toronto Taxi Cab company (at their own expense) sent out 40 or 50 taxis to take our seniors to High Park for Sunday picnics. And I remember the time someone donated Arthur Murray dance classes to the grateful residents. There were probably around 300 direct service volunteers back then and there are nearly 3,000 now. The simplicity has changed but not the commitment. If you just sit and listen to the problems of our residents and patients, it makes them feel good and you feel good for having been there for them.

My proudest accomplishment was serving as chairman of volunteer services for over 20 years where I endeavoured to see Baycrest offer the best in volunteerism. In 1983, I received an Award of Merit from the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. It was a memorable experience to stand in city hall and receive that award. In 1977, I received the Men's Service Group President's Award as well as the Volunteer Service Award from the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration.

As chairman of the volunteer recognition event for over 20 years, I tried to do my best to make sure volunteers received the recognition they so richly deserved.

Martin Storm

Volunteering at Baycrest was a labour of love for me and when it came time to leave, I had trouble doing so because of how much I enjoyed the work.

Back in 1961, I took a course offered by the Jewish Federation of Toronto that introduced young people to the different Jewish services available in the city. That created my initial interest in Baycrest. Secondly, my wife, Francie, who I was dating at the time, was the daughter of the president of the Women's Auxiliary, Anne Gans, so Baycrest was something that was spoken about all the time at their dinner table and that got me even more interested.

I was first involved with the admissions and financial subcommittees and I eventually became chairman of both, later becoming a board member and treasurer. After a number of years, I left the Baycrest board and became treasurer of the Baycrest Foundation and when that term ended, I returned to Baycrest where I sat on the board of directors for many years. What impressed me most was that Baycrest's focus was so clear, not only in terms of what the current needs were, but also in terms of what had to be done as the elderly community changed and grew.

Spending time at Baycrest over the years always gave me a very deep sense of satisfaction. I always felt I was working with dedicated and committed people who shared my own appreciation of the importance of providing vital and quality services to the community. I made wonderful associations with a number of people and I have very good memories of my years of involvement there.

Miklos and Gabriella Szanto

Miklos 1907 – 1995

Travelling through life together, Gabriella Szanto and her late husband, Miklos, exemplified resilience, courage and a strong work ethic. Even though her parents were well off in Hungary before the war, living in a world of governesses, servants and balls, Gabriella's father insisted she learn their couturier business. Miklos also came from a privileged background, but worked in the family business, learning skills that later helped him establish companies of his own.

The Holocaust swept away their comfortable life and most of their extended family. Gabriella went into hiding with her mother and Miklos was interned in a concentration camp. After the war, they travelled widely and lived in several countries. At one point, Miklos operated a very successful business selling pineapple juice in Australia.

"We were gypsies," Gabriella says. In each city, she continued her trade, attracting a well-off clientele. Everything she and Miklos earned, they saved.

In 1970, the Szantos were among the first donors to plan a gift in their will to Baycrest. They learned about the organization through a friend of Gabriella's mother and thought it was a "fantastic place for old people." Their commitment grew stronger in 1990, when Miklos became sick and doctors couldn't diagnose his condition. He came to Baycrest, where the problem was identified and successfully treated. Several years later, Miklos passed away.

"Miklos was a very good-hearted person and we had a very happy life together," Gabriella says. "We always had enough money to pay the rent, because my father taught me his trade. When we weren't happy, we moved on. I always knew that things would turn out well and never worried about what would happen. Never."

Endel Tulving

In 1992, I reached the age of 65 and as a University of Toronto psychology professor that meant I was required to retire. At that critical juncture, Dr. Don Stuss, the recently appointed first director of The Rotman Research Institute, asked me if I might want to come and join him. Having known a great deal about the institute, I took up the offer.

Not long after this, Don brought my name to the attention of Anne Tanenbaum and her family who were interested in establishing a research chair at Baycrest. Don said my role as chair would allow me to continue my research, perhaps with more of a slant towards aging and disorders of memory. So I became the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Chair in Cognitive Neuroscience at Baycrest and the University of Toronto.

Baycrest and The Rotman Research Institute have made my life satisfying, rewarding and happy over the last 14 years. It's hard for me to say what I've given back to the institute, but since 1992, a great deal more is known about how people's brains and minds change as they age.

After winning the Gairdner International Award in 2005, for the implications my research has had on disorders of memory, I decided to donate the prize money to Baycrest. I did this because I'm very grateful to Baycrest for accommodating The Rotman Research Institute, I'm very grateful to Don Stuss for the opportunity he offered me back in 1992, and I thought this might be a sort of tangible token of my appreciation.

Sydney Wax

During my 36 years at Baycrest, I was able to play a part in the evolution of the field of geriatrics and in the development of more humane and professional care of the elderly with dementia and Alzheimer's disease.

In 1956, Dr. Henry Himmel, chief of medicine for Baycrest Hospital, recruited me to work with patients who had cognitive failure, and who, at that time, were treated as senile or demented. I changed the name of the section from Senile Department to the Special Care Section for Rehabilitation and Research.

Over time, as senior physician, I led a team that developed a special care program that was founded on a medical/research basis. We organized regular team meetings, consulted with families, developed diagnostic and treatment techniques, and researched new ways to provide superior care.

Later, as Baycrest's co-ordinator of medical education, I set up courses for medical students from the University of Toronto, and in 1980, established Baycrest's annual clinic day in primary care geriatrics, which eventually drew 400 general practitioners. During those years, I was also chair of Baycrest's medical advisory committee, assistant professor at the University of Toronto, and senior physician at Mount Sinai Hospital, where I chaired a special committee to research and improve the care of the hospital's elderly patients. I also served as president of the medical staff at Baycrest for two terms.

My other life-long interest has been art. In 1973, Dora Till and I founded Baycrest's heritage museum for Judaica. I served as the museum's curator and chairman of the executive and exhibits committee.

I retired in 1992 and feel gratified that in addition to providing care, I was able to help develop policies that will have a lasting impact on the elderly, particularly those with dementia, cognitive failure and Alzheimer's disease.

Jack and Anne Weinbaum

Jack and Anne Weinbaum grew up in religious families in pre-WWII Poland, where tzedekah and caring for others were strong traditions. Those values set them on a path which eventually led to their leadership support of Baycrest and the new Brain Health Centre.

"On Fridays, we cooked extra food and challahs so that all the people in our community could enjoy Shabbos," Anne remembers. "My father gave 50 pairs of shoes to local school children at Chanukah and Jack's father helped distribute interest-free loans to the needy in his town."

In 1948, having survived the Holocaust, the newlyweds arrived in Toronto with an appreciation for life and a desire to thrive. They built a successful real estate business, which enabled them to give back to the community where they had achieved success.

Over the years, Anne's step-mother and father came to Baycrest for care and she was very impressed with its services. In 1976, the Weinbaums contributed to the building campaign for the Wagman Centre and later dedicated a room in Baycrest Hospital in honour of Anne's mother, Rachel Bugajski Steinfeld.

More recently, the Weinbaums have become major contributors towards Baycrest's purchase of its own fMRI, a highly sophisticated brain-scanning machine used for research. In addition, the 6th floor of the Brain Health Centre, which houses the clinics for mood, stroke and memory disorders, was named in their honour.

"We have been strong supporters of Jewish education and hospitals for years," Jack says. "And we wanted to give a special gift to Baycrest because we know through personal experience that they provide excellent care. It is a privilege to be able to share our good fortune with Baycrest and with the people who need the services it provides."

Frances Wintrob

Baycrest has grown so much in the years since I first started to volunteer there that I no longer need to exercise – it's enough to walk the long corridors to my husband Irving's room in the Apotex Centre, JHA every day. Irving was very active in Baycrest's Men's Service Group and Beth Tzedec Synagogue and I was involved in the Women's Auxiliary (WA) and the Sisterhood. I also taught English to Holocaust survivors at the National Council of Jewish Women.

I started to volunteer with Baycrest's WA when founding president Dora Till was there. Dora started so many of the programs we have today and when I was WA president from 1966 to 1968, I just tried to continue them. We started a library, a beauty shop, the Shabbat and festival lights program and the speaker's bureau. We also used to go out to small towns to educate people about Baycrest. In 1954, we were there to welcome everyone when they brought people from the old Cecil Street home to the new Jewish Home for the Aged.

When I think of all the women who worked so hard for the WA, I'm very proud of all the things we did. My husband and I used to travel and everywhere we went we visited homes for the aged. It was amazing how Baycrest always stood out as the top in its field. The research that is done is exceptional and the care is wonderful. Again, I should say, I'm very proud of the work we did and of Baycrest's good name and good will.

Irwin Wortsman

I used to drive past Baycrest and I had no idea what went on behind those walls. Many years later, I was invited to attend a Men's Service Group meeting. When I walked into the building, I saw many of the residents and my heart went out to them. I then understood why I needed to become involved. Some people write cheques and walk away, but I feel it's important to make time as well as a financial commitment to Baycrest. After all, let's not forget that the generations before us helped shape the lifestyle many of us are fortunate enough to enjoy now!

I had the privilege to serve as president of the Men's Service Group for two terms and I am presently chair of the planned giving committee. It has been my extreme pleasure to work alongside Baycrest Foundation president Mark Gryfe and the director of planned giving, Florence Weinberger.

My wife, Elayne, and I both feel strongly about providing some enjoyment and comfort to the elderly and feel it's vital to involve future generations to ensure this legacy.

We have established an endowment fund and also contributed to Baycrest's summer youth volunteer program because we believe if you involve kids at an early age, they'll understand and come back to Baycrest as adults to continue the mitzvah of giving back. Hopefully, our children and grandchildren will continue this tradition, as well!

'Israel will disappear soon,' Iranian president vows

Jerusalem Post

TEHRAN — "Israel is destined for destruction and it will disappear soon," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Monday.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Speaking to government ministers in Tehran, Ahmadinejad said the world's powers created "the Zionist regime" to increase their dominance in the region and that Israel "slaughters Palestinians on a daily basis."

The Iranian president added that since Israel is "a contradiction to nature, we foresee its rapid disappearance and destruction."

Ahmadinejad's comments came after Israeli military officials told Britain's Sunday Times that the Jewish state must prepare for a full-scale war in which Iran and Syria will be important players.

"The challenge from Iran and Syria is now top of the Israeli defence agenda, higher than the Palestinian one," another official said.

The recent war with Hezbollah and the threat that Iran could achieve nuclear weapons capability have led Israel to re-examine its defence strategies and focus on the region's two major supporters of terror, Israel Defence Forces sources have said recently.

One conclusion is that Israel has allocated too much time and energy to the threat posed by Palestinian terror groups in the West Bank and Gaza.

According to London's International Institute for Strategic Studies, both Iran and Syria have ballistic missiles whose range extends over most of Israel, including Tel Aviv. Funds have reportedly been approved for the construction of appropriately equipped shelters.

Hana's Suitcase wins Yad Vashem Award

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — George Brady never imagined he would accept an award for children's Holocaust literature at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem. But the Czechoslovakian-born survivor of Auschwitz, who moved to Toronto in 1951, did just that on Oct. 30.

Along with his 22-year-old daughter, Lara Hana, and Tokyo-based teacher Fumiko Ishioka, Brady accepted the 2006 Yad Vashem Award on behalf of first-time Canadian author Karen Levine for Hana's Suitcase.

The book cover of Hana's Suitcase

The 2002 book was selected from among 10 children's books, which, other than Hana's Suitcase, were originally written in Hebrew by Israeli authors.

Hana's Suitcase is the story of Brady's younger sister, Hana, who, in 1942 at the age of 10, was killed at Auschwitz, and the Japanese educator who told her story to the world. "Never in my wildest imagination did I ever expect that this would happen,"

Ottawa considers security assistance

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Canada is considering measures that would help minority communities finance security measures against terrorist attack.

A spokesperson for Stockwell Day, the minister of public security, said the government is studying requests to provide funds that would enable at-risk communities to protect themselves. However, "there is still no clear commitment at this point. It is under consideration, but I don't have any details," said Melisa Leclerc, director of communications for Day.

Stockwell Day

"The department will come up with different options at some point, and we will review them and see if they are feasible. But at this point, it would be pure speculation."

The announcement was welcomed by the Jewish community, which has stepped up security measures in recent years to protect itself from hate crimes and terrorist attacks. Just last week, vandals threw rocks and shattered windows at Hillel House at University of British Columbia in Vancouver.

The cost of enhancing security at Jewish institutions, such as synagogues, community buildings and schools, "has been overwhelmingly high," said Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The News in Brief

CANADA

B'nai Brith Testifies

OTTAWA — Stressing that protecting citizens from terror should be the government's top priority, B'nai Brith made opening statements last week to the inquiry into the 1985 Air India bombing. The group, which has intervener status at the inquiry, wants more resources for countering financing of terrorism, stricter penalties for perpetrators, and better co-ordination between police, security and intelligence agencies in Canada and abroad. It also said it will keep pressing government for funding help for Jewish institutions that are vulnerable to terror.

Conference Disrupted

TORONTO — A medical video conference that would have linked Canadian, Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian medical professionals was disrupted Nov. 9 due to West Bank unrest. Because of Israeli shooting and shelling, the Palestinians were unable to reach the video link at Al Quds University in the town of Abu Dis. The other participants still consulted about the case that was the topic of the conference, however, and were apparently eager to go on with the program, which was organized by Dr. Arnold Noyek, an otolaryngologist at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

WORLD

College Seeks Funds

PHILADELPHIA — The Reconstructionist Rabbinical College has launched a public fundraising campaign. The Philadelphia-area school, which has raised $29 million (US) from private supporters since 2004, is seeking to reach the rest of its $50-million goal over the next five years.

School Attacked Again

PARIS — Arsonists reportedly set fire to a Jewish school near Paris. No one was hurt in the overnight fire last Thursday at the Merkaz Hatorah school in suburban Gagny. The building was hit by arsonists just before it opened in 2003, causing extensive damage.

New Shul Almost Done

TALLINN — Estonia's Jewish community hopes that its first shul built since World War II will open in February. Construction of the $2-million (US), 200-seat shul started in 2005 in central Tallinn, the capital. "It's almost finished," spokesperson Rabbi Shmuel Kot told Associated Press, which noted the shul was to have opened this month, but was delayed by extra construction. There are 3,000 Jews in Estonia, mostly in Tallinn.

Nazism Praised

VIENNA — In a TV interview last week, a member of Austria's Parliament said Nazism had its "good sides, only we don't want to see them today." Other parties condemned Wolfgang Zanger, 37, of the far-right Freedom Party (FP), and the Green Party urged him to resign. Zanger, is one of 21 FP members who won seats in Oct. 1 elections. The party, which has a history of anti-Semitism and racism, won 11 per cent of the vote.

Picasso Sale Halted

NEW YORK — Last week's auction of a Picasso painting valued at $60 million (US) was halted at the last minute because of a claim by the heir of a Shoah victim that it was sold under Nazi duress in 1934. A judge had allowed the sale of British composer Andrew Lloyd Webber's Portrait of Angel Fernandez de Soto to go ahead despite the claim. The U.S. judge had earlier blocked the sale because Julius Schoeps, the heir of a Jewish banker from Berlin, sued Webber's foundation, claiming the Nazis forced Schoeps to sell the work.

Busch Gives Cash

NEW YORK — Anheuser Busch Companies donated $100,000 (US) to the UJA-Federation of New York. The money will go to non-sectarian education and social welfare services, the federation said. Since 1993, the beer giant has given more than $5.7 million to Jewish agencies, including the New York federation.

UC Campuses Defaced With Swastikas

LOS ANGELES — Two University of California campuses were vandalized recently with Nazi graffiti.

A UC-Irvine residence hall was spray-painted with swastikas in October, and similar vandalism occurred in a UCLA residence bathroom Nov. 2, CampusJ.com reported.

Campus police have no suspects at either school.

The vandalism led to revelations of other anti-Jewish activity. At UCLA, students cited other incidents of swastika graffiti. At UC-Irvine, several Jewish students said they had been subject to physical and verbal intimidation, and a number met with the chancellor and vice-chancellor.

While UCLA hasn't responded to the situation, UC-Irvine officials have said the vandalism there was not anti-Semitic and that there would be no effort to curtail hate speech.

"One person's hate speech is another person's education," vice-chancellor Manuel Gomez said.

Survivor warns Jews to 'stay alert'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It was all about remembering.

Last week on Nov. 9, the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht, Greta Stanton, professor emerita of social work at Rutgers University in New Jersey, sat in front of a crowded hall at Shaar Shalom Synagogue and recalled that fateful night and her memories of life under Hitler in Vienna.

Stanton, once a champion diver for Jewish Viennese Sports Club Hakoah, was featured in Watermarks, the 2004 documentary that reunited Hakoah's women's swim team of the 1930s for the first time since the Nazis closed the club in 1938.

The talk was a fitting close to Holocaust Education Week.

After partaking in a candlelighting ceremony commemorating the victims of Kristallnacht, Stanton, flanked by members of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, began her talk.

Like a sweet bubbie, the 87-year-old regaled her audience with a mix of humorous family anecdotes and sobering memories.

"I'm deeply honoured to be here," Stanton told the audience. "Part of my mission is to speak about the Holocaust, [and] if what I speak about now can be a warning to stay alert, then so be it."

Moving from one memory to the next, she painted a picture of her pre-war Jewish community in Austria that could have been a portrait of any Jewish community in the world today.

She drew parallels between the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe then and now, telling her listeners not to dismiss what is happening on that continent, and not to underestimate anti-Semitism in North America.

Stanton reminded the crowd that complacency can be disastrous.

"Remember," she counselled, "Hitler did not come to Austria until 1938. But anti-Semitism was alive and well in Austria before Hitler [came]."

She recalled how the Jews of Austria were "emotionally oblivious" to what the Germans were planning. "So the Anschluss [Austria's annexation by Germany] came as a complete surprise to us," she said. "I was scared to death."

Though there were many horrors to come for Austria's Jews, Stanton managed to get out in 1939 with the help of her Hakoah coaches. [She said she didn't have time to elaborate on how this was accomplished.]

Hakoah was founded in 1909 in direct response to the Aryan Paragraph, which banned Jewish athletes from Austrian sports clubs. It had become one of Europe's largest athletic clubs before the Nazis shut it down in 1938.

Though Stanton and her teammates, all high-school friends, all managed to escape the war, she said that it was not until the making of Watermarks, under the gentle prodding of director Yaron Zilberman, that she could bear to think beyond the sadness of Nazi brutality to her happy teen years with friends in Austria.

"We were middle-class kids who grew up very [secular]," Stanton recalled, adding that she remembered going boating and swimming with her friends, despite knowing that Jews were not permitted in certain areas.

"[The Nazis] told us not to sit on park benches or go here or there," she said. "But we were young, so if they didn't [specifically] tell us not to go rowing or swim, we did."

To this day, Stanton said she remains surprised that she survived at all, calling the feat either "dumb-luck or divine providence."

Though she said she can never forget the atrocities committed by the Nazis and their collaborators, her experiences in recent years have taught her the value of broadmindedness.

"When I went back to Vienna the first couple of times, I could not stay more than two days," she said. "Any time I saw [a senior] in the street, I would think 'Did you help send my family to the camps?' But [in the process of making Watermarks], I saw that the new generations were more tolerant."

Bringing this new philosophy to bear, she cautioned members of the audience not to let anger rule their outlook.

"If I had talked to you 60 years ago, I would have spoken differently," she said. "But if we can use our experiences to fight today's genocides, it's a better idea than to hate," she said.

Fire destroys landmark Perl's deli

Firefighters are still investigating the four-alarm fire that destroyed Perl's Kosher Meat and Delicatessen on Nov. 10.

The fire department was alerted to the blaze, which caused between $1 million and $2 million in damages, after Bracha Sorek, owner of Haymishe Bagel, whose store is in the same plaza on Bathurst Street just south of Lawrence Avenue, saw smoke coming from the deli.

Due to the onset of Shabbat, Herman Perl, 81, a Holocaust survivor who started the business more than 50 years ago, didn't know about the fire until hours after it began.

Toronto Fire spokesperson Mike Strapko said he believes the fire was caused by heat generated by one of the industrial stoves in the building.

The heat from the oven affected the "dried-out old wood which we think ended up igniting [it] and causing the fire," he told the Toronto Star.

It took firefighters more than four hours to bring the blaze under control.

In an interview with the Star, Perl said his son closed the store at 4 p.m. for Shabbat, and he made sure everything was shut down and the ovens were turned off.

Perl's was the first butcher in Toronto to sell ready-made kosher food, and Perl's products are now available at most grocery chains in the city.

"I was the one who started it, who made it so the Jewish community could eat kosher," he told the Globe and Mail. "I made the kosher meat myself. I was the first one to eviscerate chickens and sell legs, cutlets, breasts in packages."

He eventually moved to the Bathurst Street location, and expanded next door to include Bais Burger, a kosher hamburger take-out restaurant.

A second Perl's location was opened on Bathurst Street in Thornhill, but it recently closed. Perl employs 60 staff, including his two sons and a son-in-law.

Perl said he plans to find a temporary headquarters for the business.

Orthodox dialogue addresses...dialogue itself

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

More than 300 people attended Torah in Motion's fifth annual Renewing Our Spirit Conference, held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation Nov. 4 and 5.

The Modern Orthodox educational organization kicked off the event with a Saturday night panel discussion on The Future of Religion in the Land of Israel, continuing Sunday with about a dozen sessions on issues including The Impact of Education on the Willingness to Think, Orthodoxy and the non-Observant Jew, and Blogs: The New Frontier of the Jewish Community.

Marvin Schick in conversation at the Torah in Motion conference.

In a panel discussion on "Orthodoxy Encounters Modernity: Dialogue on the Issues that Face Us," Samuel Heilman, sociologist and author of Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Jewry, said that the "Modern Orthodox who seek to engage people to their left are often in some ways outcast or demonized. Talking to a non-Orthodox Jew, or heaven forbid a non-Jew, is somehow embracing everything that person stands for."

Marvin Schick, a lawyer and the president of the Rabbi Jacob Joseph School in New York, took issue with much of what Heilman said on the panel, and vice versa. Schick claimed the notion of demonization is "just false."

Rabbi Gil Student, president of Yashar Books – publisher of Rabbi Natan Slifkin, some of whose books were banned by North American and Israeli haredi rabbis in 2005 – said he doesn't "understand the benefit we'd get from dialogue."

He said that one former benefit of dialogue – "mekarev," or the possibility of bringing Jews closer to Judaism – is now the domain of outreach professionals.

Interestingly, his internet blog (web log) – hirhurim.blogspot.com – is a lively online forum for "insider" discussion among Modern Orthodox and haredi Jews, an "astounding" number of whom have wireless internet access, he noted. It is also read by some non-Orthodox Jews and the occasional non-Jew, he said in an earlier presentation on Blogs: The New Frontier of the Jewish Community.

Referring to family situations, panelists disagreed vehemently on whether families with Orthodox and non-Orthodox members get along. "What we've learned to do in the private domain is act civilly and have good relations," said Schick, to audience response of disagreement and vocal rumblings.

American-born Adam Ferziger of Bar-Ilan University – an ordained rabbi and author of Exclusion and Hierarchy: Orthodoxy, Nonobservance and the Emergence of Modern Jewish Identity – spoke from his own family's experience when he said his late father's legacy was "love, respect and family commitment" even when other family members chose a different path. "He always said, 'Our Shabbat table is your Shabbat table...' The positives that can come from that are much greater than the dangers involved."

Ferziger lamented the loss of Modern Orthodoxy's philosophy behind the 1960s and 1970s movement to free Soviet Jewry. Modern Orthodox rabbis who were part of that effort "felt that working in partnership with non-Orthodox Jews to accomplish agreed-upon goals was part of their Orthodoxy,"

Friends group aims to help Israeli firefighters

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Lebanon war has forced Israeli security and defence strategists to prepare for the inevitable escalation of missile warfare, says a former head of Shin Bet, the Israeli secret service.

"We woke up before nuclear terrorism," said Carmi Gillon, who presented his grim prediction to some 120 young Jewish executives at a recent fundraiser at the Spin Master toy company showroom.

The event was the second in the Blue Rooster Speaker Series, which aims to engage young Jewish executives on political, social and economic issues facing Israel. Money raised that evening was allocated to the purchase of a new fire truck in Israel.

Gillon is among a group of high-profile Israelis who have been recruited by Friends of Israel Firefighters to raise awareness about the needs of these emergency frontline workers. He told the audience that while the summer war forced Israelis to confront the country's military vulnerabilities, the Hezbollah attacks have also strengthened solidarity among Israelis.

The country pulled together to help out the 4,000 Jewish families displaced by Hezbollah rocket fire, he said. "In our small town, we invited 100 families to stay in our homes."

Also speaking at the Blue Rooster event was Yitzhak Levy, a firefighter from Rishon Lezion, a town just south of Tel Aviv that has seen dozens of its citizens killed or injured by three suicide bomb attacks in recent years. Levy said firefighters are always the first to respond to these bombings.

He said firefighters from across Israel were sent to the north to do rescue work during the Lebanon war. He recounted how he and his team tried to help a Druze family whose home had been bombed, but their rescue efforts were hindered because their large fire trucks couldn't get access to the burning house.

Fortunately, another firefighter team in a mini-pumper, a small technologically advanced fire truck that can navigate narrow roads, was able to rescue the surviving family members, Levy said. "The mini-pumper is the reason the family is alive and well today."

Indeed, it was the mini-pumper that indirectly inspired the evening and was the catalyst for the Blue Rooster initiative, which was hatched at the height of the Lebanon war in July.

At the time, Mira Shem Tov, 32, a professional networker and matchmaker, and Ronnen Harary, 35, co-CEO of Spin Master, were on a solidarity mission to Israel organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

A briefing at the fire station in Hadera inspired Shem Tov and Harary to raise funds for the firefighters, Shem Tov told The CJN.

"We were so taken by the firefighters. They were the first people on the scene…We realized how desperately they needed more equipment," she said.

She added that she and Harary were particularly impressed with the utility and versatility of the mini-pumper. "It's a great solution for getting in and out of tight spaces in Israel."

She said that when she and Harary discovered the cost of the vehicle – $100,000 – they decided to involve their peers to raise funds to purchase one of the trucks. "Ronnen and I looked at each other and we said, 'We can do that.' That began the cause of raising money for the fire truck."

With that goal in mind, Shem Tov and Harary established Blue Rooster, which Shem Tov described as an "independent grass-roots group geared to engaging young Jewish executives on their terms.

"We wanted to build a platform to involve our peers in the community. Our generation wants a platform for more community involvement with like-minded people in our age group. Fundraising is only one aspect."

The war in Lebanon has galvanized many of her peers to come together to support Israel, she said. "There was a tremendous amount of urgency."

In fact, while Shem Tov and Harary were on the mission, some of their friends had organized a fundraiser for Israel at the Spoke Club that drew more than 100 people.

The plan to buy a new mini-pumper has given the group's fundraising efforts a more tangible goal, said Shem Tov, explaining that mobilizing their peers for this purpose is an aspect of the Blue Rooster agenda. "We always want to raise money for something tangible. The firefighters were the perfect cause.

"We want to have a say in where the money gets directed. That's something very true for our generation. We want to see the results of our donations."

The group isn't limited to fundraising, Shem Tov said. "We want intellectual and stimulating dialogue. There are no parameters. Maybe we'll have parties – whatever it takes to bring people together."

So far, the Blue Rooster initiative has raised more than $30,000 toward the purchase of the mini-pumper, she said. "We have been pleasantly surprised by the turnout, generosity and the commitment of people who want to get involved."

Sponsors of the Blue Rooster event included UJA Federation, El Al, Sabon, and Grafstein's Wines.

Jimmy Carter's vanity and perfidy

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter made an unexpected appearance last January at the annual Herzliya Conference in Israel. Carter was in Israel on his way to the Palestinian territories to observe the elections about to unfold in the Palestinian Authority. The conference schedule was quickly re-arranged to accommodate Carter's desire to address the august assembly of policy and decision-makers from around the globe.

Carter spoke for some 30 minutes from a prepared text. For the most part, he imparted a familiar charge sheet of demands against Israel of familiar but tired platitudes stating that the Israeli settlements are an obstacle to peace. He called on Israel to leave "Palestinian occupied territory" so that the Palestinians could get on with the task of building their own country.

The defining moment of Carter's appearance at the conference, however, came when he answered a few, brief questions after his remarks.

Why, one person asked, did the former president appear to constantly single out Israel as the reason that peace had not yet blossomed between Palestinians and Israelis? The questioner pointed to the fact that after the signing of the Oslo accords in 1993, Israeli government officials and society at large geared up for a much-yearned-for peace with the Palestinians, even to the point of changing entries in school textbooks to cast the Palestinian struggle in a different, more sympathetic light. Israeli leaders planned joint economic, medical, educational, and agricultural projects with Jordanians and Palestinians.

By contrast, the questioner continued, Palestinian leaders seized the Oslo opportunity to invigorate and heighten their incitement against the Jewish state, Israelis and Jews. Former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and his cadre, subsequent events and documents proved, planned a war of terrorism against the Jews.

In his response to the questioner, the former U.S. president said he was unaware of such incitement being carried on by the Palestinians against Israel, but he was opposed to it if it was happening.

Carter's answer left most of the people in the room agasp. More than 12 years after Oslo, how could he not know? What had he been reading? To whom had he spoken? What had he observed?

This week his latest book was scheduled to be released. It is titled Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid. The CJN has not yet seen, let alone read, the book. But its very title is an affront to honesty and accuracy. The deliberate tying of the term "apartheid" to Israel feeds the frenzied anti-Israel appetite and encourages the hatred of all those who pronounced their plans in Durban, South Africa, in 2001 to dismantle the Jewish state, just as South Africa had been dismantled in its time.

The title speaks to the vanity of the man who, though ignorant of the facts, wishes to impose his preconceived solutions to the conflict. But that he lends the prestige of the U.S. presidency to the cause of those who seek to do away with Israel speaks to his perfidy.

25 years ago in The CJN

Toronto Liberal MP Roland de Corneille announced the formation of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, which aimed to exchange information and visits between Canadian MPs and Israeli legislators. Among the group's other founders were Liberal MPs Herb Gray and Jim Peterson, as well as NDP MP Bob Rae and Tory MP Flora MacDonald.

French Auschwitz transports

The Société Nationale des Chemins de fers Français (SNCF) case is about how the railway transported Jews during the Nazi occupation of France throughout World War II ("Canadians seek French redress for Auschwitz transports," CJN, Oct. 5; "Auschwitz transports," letter, CJN, Oct. 12). There is no question that the SNCF used livestock cars for the transportation of Jews to death camps such as Auschwitz.

In 1997, French President Jacques Chirac recognized France's role in the oppression of Jews during World War II, and the subsequent trial of Maurice Papon, a French Vichy government official who collaborated with the Nazis, proved the undeniable participation of the government and therefore its agencies in the deportations. While the SNCF may argue that the German and the French governments were calling the shots, they have not provided proof that they were forced by any entity to charge a fare for a service they did not supply.

In the Lipietz case, in which Alain Lipietz and his sister successfully sued the railway and the French government, three judges debated on the liability of the SNCF for five years and examined the exhibits produced by the SNCF and by the plaintiffs. How can French historians challenge such a judgment when they have never had access to the SNCF's archives?

My uncle fought in the French army from 1939 to 1940. He was one of the earlier detainees brought in to custody and was sent to Pithiviers on May 14, 1941. He was deported to Auschwitz on July 17, 1942, and, according to infirmary records, died in Auschwitz on May 21, 1943, the same month that Josef Mengele arrived at the camp. In total, 13 members of our Paris family – including seven children – were interned in Pithiviers and Drancy and then deported to their final death.

Whether historians agree or disagree on this case is irrelevant. If any group has a right to be apoplectic, it is the survivors and families of those who lost their lives, either during or after their sub-human transportation on SNCF cattle cars.

Vote Conservative?

As much as I understand Bert Raphael's plea for Jews to vote Conservative, as Canadian Jews, I believe we should not relegate ourselves to a one-issue special-interest group ("Harper's support of Israel," letter, CJN, Nov. 2). There are many problems and issues here in Canada that need to be addressed, and as citizens of this great country, we must examine each one and decide which party would best address the needs of our respective communities. Canada's support of Israel is very important, and we must do whatever it takes to encourage that, but we must also examine each party's stance on many social issues that affect all of us as citizens. Voting without examining all the issues is not good for Jews, and it's not good for Canada.

Prayer services too long

I am a 15-year-old high school student. I am in agreement with the author of the article "Shortening the length of shul services: a modest proposal" (CJN, Oct. 12). As a religious teenager, I find that the prayer services for Shabbat and the High Holy Days take much too long to finish.

I think it is a very good idea that the rabbi's sermon takes place after the service, so the people who want to leave don't have to feel bad about leaving before prayers finish. The only thing I am not in agreement with is that Kedushah should be shortened. In fact, in my opinion, most people find Kedushah beautiful due to the fact that it is said in different tunes so it should not be changed in any way. Another thing that could be done to shorten services is to say the services silently. I notice that most shuls say the services out loud as a congregation, and this just makes the services longer. There is no sin in saying the services silently to yourself, as long as you have 10 men to make a minyan. You are still fulfilling the mitzvah of praying to God.

Don't shorten services

In the article "Shortening the length of shul services: a modest proposal" (CJN, Oct. 12), Murray Teitel suggests shortening services to increase shul attendance. I disagree with his suggestion to have time limits for different sections of the services. If you give every prayer a time limit, it becomes a routine, and it takes away from the beauty of davening. Praying to God is meant to be inspiring and joyous. If it appears boring, then there is something wrong. Personally, as a religious teenager, I feel it does take time to get used to and understand davening, but once you do, you will realize the beauty of it, and this will be lost if davening becomes a scheduled procedure. And if you shorten the services, as Teitel suggests, it will drive away all the other members who enjoy the services, which will ultimately keep down attendance.

U.S. mid-term election could affect foreign policy

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

The tone of the U.S.-Israel relationship remains the same whoever controls the U.S. Congress, but Democratic pledges to stringently oversee the Iraq war could affect how the United States confronts Iran.

Democrats won control of the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate in the Nov. 7 mid-term elections, the latter conclusively decided with Senator George Allen's concession of the Virginia race on Nov 9.

The first casualty of the new order appeared to be Donald Rumsfeld, President George W. Bush's deeply unpopular defence secretary who was identified with the Iraq war. Rumsfeld's removal meant the cabinet had lost one of the most ardent advocates of the policy of containing Iran.

Bipartisan support for Israel would be constant, Jewish and Israeli officials said, defying a pre-election barrage of Republic Jewish Coalition ads that insisted that the Democratic Party's support for Israel was eroding.

"It's clear the 110th Congress will continue America's long tradition of staunch support for a strong, safe and secure Israel and an abiding relationship between the United States and our most reliable ally in the Middle East," said Josh Block, a spokesperson for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Deadlock between Congress and the White House "will influence domestic policy – immigration, health care, taxes, social policies, the Supreme Court. It won't influence foreign policy, with the possible exception of Iraq," said Danny Ayalon, the Israeli ambassador to Washington, who is finishing his term. "For sure, not the U.S.-Israel relationship."

Ayalon said there simply wasn't that much to reconsider in the region, as long as the Hamas party that rules the Palestinian Authority continues to reject Israel's existence and refuses to renounce terrorism.

If the Bush administration and Congress don't see "an internal Palestinian process that reveals a real partner, one that gives and takes with the Israeli government, it will be more of the same," he said.

Top Democrats, including party chairman Howard Dean, said in the final days of the campaign that the party would leave foreign policy to the president.

"The Democratic leadership would know its limits in a time when it has a small majority in the House or Senate," Ira Forman, executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council, said days before the election.

Still, Congress could have a profound influence on foreign policy through its most powerful tool: oversight.

The inevitable debate over the Iraq war could reveal differences on how to deal with Iran's nuclear threat, hampering Bush administration efforts to force Iran to stop enriching uranium, a precursor to manufacturing a nuclear weapon, said Raymond Tanter, a Georgetown University professor who heads the Iran Policy Committee, a group that advocates Western support for opposition groups in Iran.

Senator Joseph Lieberman won as an Independant in Connecticut. [RNS/File photo]

The White House "will have to accommodate the 'realists,'" Tanter said, referring to the foreign policy hands who favor limiting U.S. intervention abroad and who played a significant role in the foreign policy of the first president Bush. The younger Bush has largely ignored their advice.

Bob Gates, Bush's nominee to replace Rumsfeld as defence secretary, is in the realist camp, which advised against the Iraq war. Gates served as CIA director under Bush's father and was close to the elder Bush's secretary of state, James Baker, and national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft. Both men are known for their opposition to the younger Bush's broad goals of democratizing Iraq and the region.

The congressionally mandated commission on the Iraq war headed by Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton reportedly is ready to recommend direct talks with Shiite-dominated Iran as a means of tamping down Shiite-Sunni violence in Iraq.

"Baker and Hamilton will be called before the congressional committees in January for hearings," Tanter said, and, subsequently, "much of the international community, intelligentsia and the press will push for a grand bargain with Iran."

That could mean allowing Iran some uranium-enrichment capabilities while extracting promises that the material would not reach weapons grade, he said.

Of course, "the only problem with a grand bargain is whether Iran will keep it," he said.

James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, said he hoped the new Congress guided by the Baker-Hamilton recommendations – would restrain what he saw as an overly aggressive posture toward Iran.

"My hope is that it provides some kind of restraint on administration policy towards Iran," he said last week at an Israel Policy Forum panel. Zogby said he agreed that Iran's theocratic leaders posed the greatest threat in the region, but that the Bush administration's belligerence had only empowered them.

"They emerged from this war in Iraq empowered and emboldened."

Michael Rubin, an Iran expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, said Iran is not a partisan issue, but he agreed that bickering over Iraq could hamper efforts to convince Iran of U.S. seriousness.

"The more we telegraph we want to pull troops from Iraq, the more the Iranians think they have us by the balls," Rubin said.

He worried that could lead to Iranian overconfidence, and much as its proxy Hezbollah misread Israel's determination to strike back this summer in Lebanon – Iran could believe it's in a position to raise the stakes.

"Iranian decision-makers don't have an accurate understanding of U.S. policy," he said. "They're dangerously overconfident."

Iranian perceptions of U.S. intent would depend more on how the Bush administration compartmentalized its domestic and foreign challenges than on how Congress behaved, said Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Reform movement's Religious Action Center, which favours aggressive congressional oversight of Iraq.

"The Clinton administration was able to maintain its agenda while dealing with investigations" during impeachment, Saperstein said. "Trying to learn the lessons from Iraq that urgently need to be learned is indispensable to acting more effectively and efficiently in securing America's security interests around the world."

Hadar Susskind, Washington director for the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, said that, like Israel, Darfur – the region of Sudan where government-allied militias have massacred tens of thousands of civilians – presents opportunities for bipartisan co-operation.

"Darfur is going to be a great test for Nancy Pelosi," the California Democrat who leads the party and is set to become speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, "and the House Democrats on how they intend to work with the president and the House minority, because there's a tremendous amount of agreement."

Bush is considering imposing sanctions on Sudan if it does not allow in UN peacekeepers by Jan. 1. U.S. Jewish groups have led the movement to bring relief to the troubled region.

Jews in the 110th U.S. Congress

The following is a list of Jewish lawmakers who will serve in the 110th U.S. Congress.

The number of Jews in the Senate will rise to 13 from 11, with two new members. Both Joseph Lieberman and Bernie Sanders won as independents, but are expected to caucus with the Democrats.

The number of Jews in the House of Representatives will rise to 30 from 26, with six new faces.

One race, involving Gary Trauner (D-Wyo.), had not been decided as of The CJN's deadline.

Abandoned again

For two years, Sharon Shenhav, together with the International Council of Jewish Women, and Rabbi Shlomo Amar, chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel, planned a conference on gittin (Jewish divorces). This was to be a special consultation with rabbis from across the Jewish world. Only invited rabbis could attend, and only rabbis directly involved with divorce in rabbinic courts (batei din) would be invited.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Those of us who have been active for decades on behalf of agunot (women denied a Jewish divorce) took great care to make sure our batei din were well represented. We also wanted to be present, but we understood the organizational premise: in order for the rabbis to have serious deliberations, they needed to be assured of privacy and confidentiality. Many rabbis – regrettably none from Canada – indicated their willingness to attend.

The conference was to take place Nov. 7 and 8.

We had high hopes. The chief rabbi's invitation was an indication of his agreement that the issue was pressing. The attendance of prominent rabbis suggested their acceptance that the problem of agunot required Jewish legal attention. (When I first began my agunah activities 30 years ago, I was told by rabbis that there was no problem and certainly not one in Jewish law.) Perhaps they would create standards of court procedure for all batei din. Perhaps they would explore and recommend the possible solutions that exist within Halachah. Perhaps they would create networks of rabbinic co-operation and future interaction. Perhaps we would see a global end to get abuse.

The solutions exist in Halachah. All sorts of new variations using old precedents have been proposed. We lack the consensus for implementation. Perhaps…

But Rabbi Amar cancelled the conference.

After two years of work, days before people were to arrive in Israel, the rabbi called it off! Why? Because of pressure from some Israeli rabbis.

But why? What could they be afraid of? A group of their own colleagues – no women present, no media, no pressure, just discussions probing possible actions or resolutions.

What is so threatening? Why don't they see the chillul HaShem (desecration) that their inaction causes? Why do they not see that they have empowered countless lawless males to use the law to abuse law-abiding women? Why do they continue to protect the husband's unilateral power at the expense of the wife?

Some rabbis still intend to go and present papers anyway. Rabbi Amar will invite them to lunch only. There will be no serious grappling with halachic ramifications and solutions.

Why not? What are they so afraid of? What a missed opportunity!

If you care, write to the chief rabbi's office. Call your own rabbi and work together to free agunot. There are many wonderful pulpit rabbis willing to help. Do something!

Jewish Book Month

It's Jewish Book Month for us, the people whose scriptures include the famous "of making many books there is no end" (Ecclesiastes12:12), as if we needed a special month to tell us to read!

I bet that Jews belong in huge numbers to book clubs, and every year when picking the titles, have a lot of trouble deciding what "Jewish books" they should choose.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

So let's see. If the question of who is a Jew is vexatious, how about the question, "What is a Jewish book?" No hiding behind Mordecai Richler or pointing grandly at Israeli authors such as Y. Yehoshua, David Grossman, Amos Oz, Yehuda Amichai, etc.

No sir, we are up against it. Too many books by Jews, and it's time to step up to the plate and decide once and for all: what is a Jewish book? I headed to my bookshelves to explore this endlessly fascinating question.

Is it any book by a Jew? Well, all you CanLit fans, are the Matt Cohen books about an Ontario non-Jewish world Jewish books because he wrote them? I say no, even though his The Spanish Doctor is, in my opinion, a quintessential Jewish book. And I even got the late author to autograph it for me.

So a Jewish author can write a non-Jewish book.

Now how about Schindler's List? Absolutely. A non-Jewish author can write a Jewish book. How about Sophie's Choice? Tougher question. Same landscape of the Holocaust kingdom of night, but not a Jewish protagonist. I'll leave that as an exercise for the reader.

How about The Gifts of the Jews by Thomas Cahill, who, although he studied at the Jewish Theological Seminary, is not Jewish. I say yes.

My book club has read both Jonathan Safran Foer books, Everything Is Illuminated and Extremely Loud and Incredibly Close. Clearly the first would qualify, since the protagonist is Jewish and searching for answers to his family's history during the Holocaust. But Oskar, the lonely and profoundly disturbed boy of the second, is of German descent and clearly not Jewish.

Here are some answers from my friends.

"Just as it is impossible to define Jewish as a noun – is it a religion? Is it a culture? Is it a nationality? – when it's used as an adjective it becomes even more oblique and challenging to capture in a definition." (Brenda)

"A Jewish book is one that has a Jewish theme." (Tracy) I just finished rereading John Milton's long epic poem Samson Agonistes, with its Jewish anti-hero. Loosely following the story in Judges, it is a discourse on physical and spiritual blindness with an Israelite protagonist. This really is not, to my mind, exclusively a Jewish theme. Then we end up arguing over what a Jewish theme is. Freedom? Law? Guilt?

I argue that the defining prose Jewish book is the Book of Genesis, both in its Hebrew version and in the magisterial King James translation, written in the cadence of Shakespeare. Genesis is the most eloquent introduction to the human race and to the origins of the Jewish people that we have, with promises and broken faith, human kindness and divine wrath, and composed with enough ambiguity to engage such disparate Jewish commentators as the author of the Zohar and Philo.

And as to the English translation: with all the errors in their understanding of Hebrew, the version the translators presented in honour of King James I is of such poetry as to dwarf any subsequent translation for its power.

So when Isaac Bashevis Singer writes in Congregations: Contemporary Writers Read the Jewish Bible that "learning [Genesis] was the greatest event in my life," I know I am not alone in my preference. "With both faith and doubt," Singer began his quest, and we can follow that theme throughout his own writings. So maybe for a book to be Jewish it has to contain both faith and doubt, these two elements in tension.

"God," he concludes, "created… with a will and a plan, and despite all the evil life undergoes, there is a purpose on Creation and eternal wisdom."

Let's add purpose and wisdom to the list of themes. Now go out and read.

Violence in the name of God

From Oct. 20 to 22 of this year, the John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights, a national, Edmonton-based non-governmental organization, sponsored an international conference on the theme of Building World Peace: The Role of Religions and Human Rights. The conference addressed a major, worldwide concern and possible solutions to the problem. Put simply, the world is faced with a chronic and pervasive issue; namely, the commission of violence in the name of God.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Although the events of Sept. 11, 2001, brought to the world's immediate attention an acute awareness of this phenomenon, violence perpetrated in God's name is neither new nor restricted to any one particular religion.

From the Crusades and witch-burning to modern-day conflicts, violence in the name of religion has occurred throughout history.

Indeed, religiously based conflicts exist in many places in our world today. Religion-based violence has carried on for decades in Northern Ireland. In northern Uganda, there is conflict between the government and the Lord's Resistance Army. In China, there are violent and oppressive acts against the Falun Gong. And Africa has been witness to the tragedy of unspeakable violence and genocide in Rwanda, Sudan and Sierra Leone.

The opening session of the conference, titled "Interfaith Perspectives on Violence," featured a panel of representatives from six major religious traditions. The three Abrahamic faiths were represented by Rabbi Lindsey bat Joseph (Jewish), Archbishop Emeritus Joseph MacNeil (Christian) and Karen Hamdon (Muslim). The other panelists included Acharya Shivshankaar Dwivedi (Hindu), Thupten Jinpa Langri (Buddhist) and Wilson Okeymow (First Nations).

These speakers engaged in a process of both introspective and outward examinations of the role of religions and human rights. They urged that moderates dominate and become the "faces" for each religious tradition and that religious leaders and spiritual advisers teach and actively promote peace and human rights.

Okeymow, a First Nations leader, referred to the residential school experience and spoke of the abuse and confusion brought to First Nations people by imposed religious teachings.

Hindu spiritual leader Dwivedi cautioned that "violence and uncontrolled desires are symptoms of the troubled mind."

Langri, president of the Institute of Tibetan Classics and a principal English translator to the Dalai Lama, cautioned that sacred texts be approached not only respectfully but also critically and cautiously since those texts were written and interpreted by "woefully imperfect human beings." He diagnosed the central problem in terms of the domination of discourse by secular thought.

Hamdon spoke of "the core values of [the Muslim] faith – those of compassion, service, charity, social justice and unity." She reminded her audience that "violence and compassionate non-violence all begin in our minds first and then are executed in reality. Keeping this in mind, faith should provide us tools to deliberately reject violence and consciously accept compassion and peace."

The speakers also commented on the role of faith in guiding our lives and the responsibilities of religious leaders in their promotion of faith. For example, Rabbi bat Joseph spoke of leadership and faith in the following terms: "If faith and faith leaders have anything to offer, it is to call attention to our common humanity… We must remind the members of our respective faith communities… that social justice is the call to justice in our society and justice of our society. It means we must be engaged in our society, speaking out against ethical and moral wrongs, advocating change, justice and ethical practices for all our citizens and in all our dealings with the rest of the world… To not speak out, to remain silent, is the greatest social injustice."

In offering their perspectives on the issue, these religious leaders demonstrated that organized religion can offer solutions to the sad and pervasive reality of religiously based violence. Religion has the potential to offer opportunities for conciliation and peace, respect and compassion. In short, religion can and should serve as an antidote for violence perpetrated in the name of God.

In my next article, I will focus on some of the other discussions and recommendations arising out of this peace-building process in Edmonton.

The Kirshner File

Harper's pro-Israel position sparks a debate

Writing in the Toronto Star last month, Conservative Senator Hugh Segal observed, "It is highly unlikely that Canada's foreign policy toward Israel will determine the outcome of our next federal election."

Segal is right, of course. The vast majority of Canadians have more pressing and immediate matters on their minds: health care, honesty in government, the economy, Quebec's place in Confederation, the latest trade dispute with the United States, the environment and the casualties Canada is sustaining in Afghanistan.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But Israel is a fairly big issue in the Liberal party, which is gearing up for its leadership convention in Montreal from Nov. 28 to Dec. 2.

Since last summer's war in Lebanon, when Prime Minister Stephen Harper described Israel's ferocious military response to Hezbollah aggression as "measured," the Liberals have been fixated on Israel, the Arab-Israeli dispute and Canada's policy in the Middle East.

Indeed, these issues have been rehashed not only by the Liberals but by the New Democratic party and the Bloc Québécois, too.

Which is really strange, since foreign policy was virtually ignored in the last federal election, and was not even a topic in the televised English and French debates between the party leaders.

In addition to triggering a lively debate in Canadian political circles, Harper's strong pro-Israel stance has galvanized many Jewish Canadians, who have traditionally voted for the Liberal party.

Heather Reisman, the president of a nationwide bookstore chain and a longtime Liberal, has apparently switched sides and now intends to support the Conservatives. Her husband, Gerald Schwartz, one of Canada's leading entrepreneurs, signed a newspaper ad complimenting Harper for "standing by Israel."

They are not the only ones who are disenchanted with the Liberals. Robert Lantos, the film producer, thanked Harper for his "principled support" of Israel and suggested that the Liberals could no longer take his allegiance for granted. Ariela Cotler, the Israeli wife of Montreal Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler, tore up her party membership card.

These developments, which may yet presage a historic shift in Canadian Jewish voting patterns, have already caused an upheaval in the ranks of the Liberals.

Recognizing that some of his constituents were unhappy with the Liberal party's position on Israel, Cotler told a reporter that he was working very hard to ensure that the Liberals "adhere to party principles" he was comfortable with when he joined the party. In a revealing aside, Cotler added, "Prime Minister Harper certainly deserves credit for speaking up early and clearly in defending Israel."

Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein is concerned as well. Responding to a statement from Liberal interim leader and former foreign minister Bill Graham that Canada should not have taken sides during the month-long war in Lebanon, Grafstein said that the Liberals were never a party of "honest brokers" preaching a balanced approach.

Susan Kadis, a Liberal MP who represents a riding in northern Toronto with a substantial Jewish population, created the biggest ripple. She withdrew as co-chair of one of the Liberal leadership front-runners, Michael Ignatieff, after he accused Israel of committing "a war crime" during the the war in Lebanon.

A Toronto MP who has had a distinguished career as an academic, author and journalist, Ignatieff issued that accusation on a French-language Quebec talk show. After apologizing for saying that he was "not losing sleep" over a July 30 Israeli air strike in Qana that resulted in the deaths of 28 Lebanese civilians, Ignatieff said, "I was a professor of human rights, and I am also a professor of the laws of war, and what happened in Qana was a war crime…"

Bill Graham

In the face of the ensuing uproar, and of a gratuitous remark by Harper that all but two of the Liberal leadership hopefuls have displayed an anti-Israel bias, Ignatieff softened his tone, saying that Hezbollah had also committed a war crime by deliberately targeting Israeli civilians. But he did not disavow his original accusation, saying it was based on reports by such groups as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International.

Ignatieff, the son of a Russian-born Canadian diplomat, describes himself as a critical "friend of Israel." Two years ago this month, he delivered a speech at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto in which he criticized Ariel Sharon's planned unilateral disengagement from the Gaza Strip and the route of Israel's security barrier through the West Bank. He also called for a contiguous Palestinian state and warned that a permanent Israeli occupation of the territories would be morally and politically unsustainable.

This past August, with the war in Lebanon still raging and with Israel intent on finishing off Hezbollah, Ignatieff – whose chief Quebec organizers took part in a pro-Lebanon march in Montreal at which several participants carried Hezbollah's flag – urged the Canadian government to back an immediate ceasefire.

Stephen Harper

If Ignatieff's "war crime" comment struck a sour note, an earlier remark by Liberal MP Borys Wrzesnewskyj was equally damaging. On a fact-finding tour of Lebanon after the war, the Toronto politician charged that Israel's offensive was nothing less than "state terrorism" and called on Canada to be more open to talking to Hezbollah.

Reacting to his observations, Graham issued a statement that satisfied neither side. Without directly addressing Wrzesnewskyj's reference to "state terrorism," he declared that the Liberals were committed to keeping Hezbollah on Canada's official terrorist list. But in affirming his party's commitment to Israel's existence and its right to self-defence, Graham muddied the waters by pointing out that "the right of self-defence is always subject to international law."

At the end of the day, however, Graham seemed more interested in attacking Harper than in defending Israel or in blasting Hezbollah. Claiming that Harper had "squandered our historic role as a Mideast bridge builder" – a point subsequently made by Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa – Graham said that he was "increasingly at odds with the global community and with our national character."

Speaking in this vein, Graham said, "It is vital for middle power nations such as Canada to pursue a fair-minded and balanced foreign policy because it preserves our ability to act as an appropriate intermediary, helping us to make peace between enemies, rather than simply validating the positions held by any one party."

Graham may have been inspired by an op-ed piece in the Globe and Mail written by Paul Heinbecker, Canada's former ambassador to the United Nations, on July 25. The core of his argument was in the first paragraph: "For good or ill, the crisis in the Middle East is a defining moment for Canadian foreign policy. The new Conservative government is apparently staking out a one-sided position on the Lebanon war and departing from policies on the Middle East adopted by previous Canadian governments. The consequence could be far-reaching and negative."

Taking Harper to task for not putting Canadian interests above "Diaspora politics," Heinbecker urged him "to criticize intransigence on both sides, including Israeli occupation of Arab land and the disproportionate aspects of Israel's response to Hezbollah."

This critique has influenced neither Harper nor his ministers.

In September, at the Francophonie summit in Romania, Harper blocked a resolution that would have recognized only Lebanese suffering during the war. "Obviously, Canada believes that the resolution has to be balanced and that we should recognize the victims in both Lebanon and Israel." Less than a month later, at a B'nai Brith banquet in Toronto, Harper said, "When it comes to dealing with a war between Israel and a terrorist organization, this country and this government cannot and never will be neutral."

In Montreal, at an Israel Bonds dinner, Foreign Minister Peter MacKay dismissed critics who claim that the Conservatives have abandoned Canada's traditional neutrality in the Arab-Israeli dispute. As he put it: "Where is the neutral ground between defending oneself and Hezbollah attacks?" He also said that his government will never recognize Hamas unless it comes to terms with Israel's existence, renounces terrorism and accepts previous agreements signed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

But are the Conservatives in tune with Canadian public opinion? Not according to a recent Globe and Mail/CTV poll, which found that 77 per cent of Canadians thought that Canada should have been neutral during Israel's war with Hezbollah.

Holocaust Education Week a hit in smaller communities

HEW reaches a larger audience than ever before

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

With 15,000 people taking part in over 100 programs, this year's Holocaust Education Week was successful not only across the GTA but in other Ontario cities as well.

The 26th annual series of Holocaust educational programs, sponsored by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto, wrapped up on November 9.

This year, programs reached wider and more diverse audiences, including schools, churches and smaller communities across the province.

In St. Catharines, author Douglas Morris spoke about his acclaimed book Justice Imperiled, which details the experiences of lawyer Max Hirschberg, who battled the Nazis in German courts in the 1930s.

"The subject was fascinating," said Marcia Donsky, a community member who attended the lecture held at Congregation B'nai Israel. "I'm glad I went."

Nearly 80 people attended the event, including members of the synagogue, students from Brock University and local lawyers.

Event organizer Howard Slepkov noted the role these types of lectures play, not only in informing and enlightening the larger community about the Holocaust, but also in helping to foster Jewish identity in the Niagara Peninsula, which has only about 1,000 Jews.

"With fewer and fewer Jews living in small towns, those left in the town have to work harder to build identity, and programs like this help to remind people of their Jewish roots," said Slepkov.

Douglas G. Morris, a New York trial attorney and historian, spoke to a Holocaust Education Week crowd in St. Catharines last week.

In Sudbury's Shaar Hashomayim Congregation, Holocaust survivor Max Eisen presented a passionate personal testimony about the horrors of Auschwitz-Birkenau and being liberated by American troops.

The vast majority of the people in attendance were non-Jews, speaking volumes about the solid interfaith dynamics of the community.

"The Jewish community here is very much tied in with the interfaith community," said Saul Cartman, who watched Eisen speak along with his wife Judi, who is a child of survivors.

Cartman added that Eisen has been to Sudbury before and his testimony is thought-provoking year after year.

"People who have seen him before always say they learn something new every time," Cartman said.

In the GTA, diverse audiences were also a theme, particularly because programs were hosted in churches and schools.

"Our goal is really to have a broad range of topics and speakers to appeal to a wide audience," said Joan Shapero, co-chair of Holocaust Education Week with Steven Albin.

"That way, we feel we're offering something unique."

For instance, in Mississauga, secondary school students watched two survivors tell their stories via a web cast.

"What we're particularly proud about is our outreach to schools, like the program in Mississauga," said Albin. "We're really moving forward in terms of using electronic tools and resources, like the webcast."

Impact Toronto attracts young Jewish adults

A new division has been created by UJA Federation to encourage young adults and future leaders to become involved in the Jewish community.

UJA Federation's former Young Adults Division (YAD) has been recast as Impact Toronto which is still comprised of members between 25 and 40 years of age, who will now have unprecedented access to social and business networking opportunities as well as involvement in the annual UJA Federation campaign.

Impact Toronto has opened up its doors to incorporate other UJA Federation divisions into the fold, including Young Finance, the Jewish Chamber of Commerce and Young Lawyers and Accountants.

"There is a real buzz, a real excitement associated with Impact Toronto, and we're hoping that it will have just that – an impact – on our community's young adults who really are our future leaders," said Julia Rowan, Impact Toronto vice-chair, along with Keith Isaac. "It's all about community, and we're letting young adults know about all the wonderful assets our community offers."

Keith Isaac, vice-chair, Impact Toronto, enjoys the recent Toronto Raptors – Maccabi Tel-Aviv basketball game along with girlfriend Janine David and other members of Impact Toronto.

Members of Impact Toronto will also benefit from a wide variety of social events held throughout the year, including Shabbat dinners, holiday parties, film screenings, guest speaker programs and Israel missions.

"We're actively letting people know about the tremendous range of opportunities out there for them to become involved with, be it educational, social or cultural," said Impact Toronto chair, Steven Farber. "We are so absolutely sure that there is something available for everyone. It's just a matter of letting them know the options so that they can become involved in something of interest to them."

Israeli doctors return from life-saving mission to China

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

An Israeli delegation of 18 medical professionals, led by the chief of staff of cardio-vascular surgery at Israel's Wolfson Hospital, Dr. Lior Sasson, recently returned home after completing a 12-day life-saving sojourn to China.

During their medical mission to the Hebei Province - located 200 miles southwest of Bejing - the group, an Israeli humanitarian foundation known as SACH, or Save a Child's Heart, performed eleven open-heart surgeries on children ranging from six months to 18 years. SACH also identified four Chinese children who, because of the complexities of their surgeries, will be flown to Israel for the procedure.

"This is what real medicine is all about. This is one of the reasons I went into medicine," Dr. Sasson told Jewish Toronto upon his return to Israel. "In Israel, if I'm not there to perform a surgery, someone else will do it. In China, if we're not there, many of these children are sentenced to death. Some of the equipment in this part of China is inferior to what we have in Israel, and they don't have the experience or the expertise needed to perform many of these open-hear surgeries. That's why some of these children are taken back to Israel where we will perform the needed surgery."

The medical team, which also included two surgeons, anaesthesiologists, ICU doctors and nurses, pediatric cardiologists, catheterization experts and heart-lung bypass machine technicians, was joined by a pediatric cardiologist from Holland, as well as a top cardiologist from the Kaplan Hospital in Rechovot and the director of pediatric emergency medicine at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital.

"In the ten years SACH has been active, we've probably operated on over 1,500 children, many of whom were flown to Israel from 26 countries," said Debra Silver, a SACH board member, who made the trip to China to document the mission. Silver, a former Torontonian, made aliya in 1973. She is the sister of Shoel Silver, the former chair of UIA Federations Canada, the umbrella organization for Canadian Jewish Federations, funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Federations across Canada.

(left) Liu Teng Yuan, who is recovering nicely from complex heart surgery in 2004, visited with the team from Israel.

SACH is supported largely through private donations and by the Nathan and Lilly Silver Family Foundation, named for Shoel and Debra's parents.

"We support a great many charities, including the Ezrat Nashim Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem where both my parents served on the board and which is one of the pioneers in Israel of tele-medicine," said Silver.

"The most satisfying thing for all of us is when we see a patient smile, when we see his parents smile," said Dr. Sasson. "We're really making a difference in the lives of children. We're giving them a chance to live as children, and grow up healthy. There's nothing more satisfying than that."

Foreign Minister maintains vigorous backing of Israel

Peter MacKay receives enthusiastic response at UJA Federation dinner

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

It would have been difficult for Canada's Minister of Foreign Affairs, Peter MacKay, to find a more receptive audience.

MacKay, the keynote speaker at UJA Federation's recent Major Gifts Dinner received a standing ovation even before his address started to more than 600 leading UJA Federation donors.

In his speech, MacKay said that Canada's support for Israel – which Major Gifts Dinner co-chair Jill Goldberg-Reitman called "unparalleled in recent Canadian history" – was a matter of putting the government's principles into practice.

MacKay acknowledged criticism of the government's solidarity with Israel during this summer's war with Hezbollah, but he asserted that neutrality would have been tantamount to saying that "we don't care if Israel exists."

"Israel doesn't need anyone's permission to exist. It has the right to defend itself, backed by international law," said MacKay.

He also referred to threats of extremism shared by both Israel and Canada. "An assault on Israel is an assault on Canadian values," declared MacKay, who bolstered his case with an historical overview.

"Canadians turned back the tide of fanatics, fascists and Nazis before and we stand ready to do it again," he said. "Throughout history, no people have suffered more than the Jewish people."

However, MacKay also called for a "fair and just resolution" to the situation facing the Palestinians based on a two state solution.

In addition to hearing MacKay, dinner participants received an update on UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, which exceeds $70 million with $19 million slated for northern Israel's emergency needs.

"The war may have ended, but for many northern Israelis, the struggle to recover has only begun," said Ariella Rohringer, who is chairing the campaign with Fred Waks.

"UJA Federation has been there from the beginning and we will not leave until the job is done," Waks added.

Kiryat Shmona residents grateful for the kindness of strangers

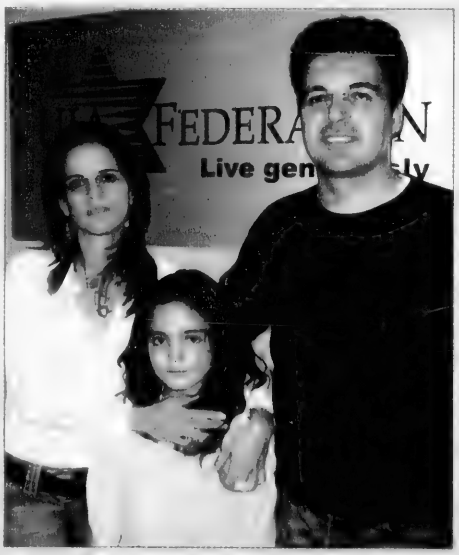
By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

After spending three months as guests in other people's homes or a series of motel rooms, Karnit and Yigal Amsalem are happy to once again sleep on their own mattresses, even thought they're on the floor. The Amsalems' house in Kiryat Shmona was destroyed this past summer by a Hezbollah rocket, and while they are now settled in a new home and stability is slowly returning to their lives, the effects of the ordeal remain evident. Their four children are "much less patient, much more tense," said Yigal, in an interview with Jewish Toronto.

The Amsalems left Kiryat Shmona shortly after the first katyusha hit. Taking only enough clothing for two days, they moved from place to place, staying with family and strangers. But relocating every few days was undermining the children's sense of security. "Where are we going to sleep tonight?" was a regular question which made Yigal and Karnit, who told her story at UJA Federation's recent Major Gifts Dinner, feel powerless as parents.

Their autistic son Ofek's difficulty with change compounded the challenge. So, they headed to Eilat hoping for a week of relaxation, but instead, their lives turned further inside-out when a neighbour called to tell them their home had been destroyed. "I didn't believe it," remembered Karnit. "I said to myself, 'No, it's not true. It can't be.' We always thought it cannot happen to us."

The nightmare that followed – sifting through the dusty mess to salvage what they could - crowding six people into two hotel rooms with nowhere to do homework or play with friends – was made bearable only by the kindness and generosity of others.



Karnit Amsalem poses in the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services along with husband Yigal and daughter Sahar.

"The people from Toronto, from Canada, from all over the world, and from Israel itself, gave help in an amazing way. It's unprecedented, I think," said Yigal. "They were the comfort," added Karnit. "You know there is someone who feels empathy for what you've been through. There were so many people in Kiryat Shmona and the area who needed so many things and the fact that there is someone so far away who doesn't really have to help – but wanted to – that was something that warmed our hearts."

Despite the trauma of losing their home, however, the Amsalems refuse to give up on the north and Kiryat Shmona, the city in which they were both born.

"It's our place. We know everyone. We know every tree. We know every road, and everyone knows us. It's like a big family," said Yigal, as Karnit nodded in agreement. "It's like when you have a child," she said. "It doesn't matter who he or she is, what they have and what they don't – that's your child and you love him or her, and this is our place and we love it."

Canadian Idol judge readies for Zareinu benefit

Shayna Markin, a non-verbal 11-year-old, demonstrates her brand new state-of-the-art touch screen voice output "talking" communication device to Canadian Idol judge Zack Werner, during a recent tour of Toronto's Zareinu Educational Centre. JNF Negev Dinner honorees a dynamic couple

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Philanthropists Fran and Edward Sonshine, the 2006 honorees at the Jewish National Fund's annual Negev Dinner in Toronto, are a dynamic duo.

Eddie, as he is known in the community, is a self-made business entrepreneur, the CEO of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust (REIT). Under his leadership, the company has grown from an asset base of under $100 million to its current status with a total enterprise value in excess of $7 billion, the largest REIT in Canada.

Fran is a professional volunteer who has dedicated her life to helping others. From volunteering to stuff envelopes for Hadassah-WIZO, she became active in the organization locally and nationally. A role model for volunteerism, she is now the chair of Baycrest Centre's board of directors and a past chair of the Baycrest Foundation.

Fran and Edward Sonshine

JNF Toronto president Ron Hoffman says the Sonshines are "the finest couple I have ever met. They embody all the values and virtues that we would hope our leaders would have. Their generosity is unlimited."

"We are so pleased to be honouring two people who are leading citizens in our community," says Ben Prossin, JNF's national executive director. "They are wonderful examples of leadership, yet possess a sense of humility."

But with all their other activities, the energetic and goal-oriented couple agree that family is their first priority and speak with pride about their children and their four grandchildren, Coby, Rachel, Jonah and Bayley.

The Sonshines, both children of Holocaust survivors, will be fêted at the Negev Dinner in recognition of their excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel on Sunday, Nov. 26, at the Sheraton Centre.

The proceeds of this year's Negev Dinner campaign will go towards the restoration and conservation of Beit Eshel in Be'er Sheva.

The Edward and Fran Sonshine Beit Eshel Historical Site Restoration will be a centre for education in heritage and environment and a place for leisure time activities.

The Sonshines were reluctant honorees. "We have been honoured, but we do not like to impose on friends," says Fran. "When we went to Israel in the summer of 2005, we met with the Keren Kayemet people and saw their goals and projects. We were convinced to accept. We want to set an example for others and know the campaign will raise a lot of money for Israel this year."

Married 38 years, Eddie and Fran Sonshine have successfully melded their worlds.

In an interview, Fran described Eddie: "He is the best – a true gute neshome who always has time for everyone, family, extended family and the community."

And Eddie describes his wife as the Energizer Bunny. "I couldn't have had the time or peace of mind to accomplish what I have without her complete support.

"Our children and grandchildren come for dinner every Friday night," he adds. "And we believe that it is important to know where you come from."

"We came from the ashes of the Holocaust," Fran says, "losing most of our families. Our story is the story of the 20th-century Jew. The horrors of war, immigrants, no family or support system, and here we are."

Eddie adds, "We are extremely fortunate and we are very grateful."

Fran's parents, Frida and Lebo Lebovici, were Holocaust survivors from Romania who met after the war. Ardent Zionists, her parents were smuggled onto a boat to Palestine. The boat was stopped and the passengers were sent to a displaced persons camp on Cyprus. Fran was born there.

In 1947, when Fran was three months old, the family was allowed to go to Palestine where her father was active in the 1948 War of Independence. The family regretfully moved to Canada in 1952.

Eddie's parent's, Ben and Helen Sonshine, were born in Poland and were in several camps during the war. After the war, they were sent to Bergen-Belsen, then to a displaced persons' camp in Germany, where Eddie was born. His mother wanted to go to Israel but was convinced by her husband in 1949 to come to Canada where he had cousins.

Eddie was 16 and Fran 15 when they met at an event run by AZA, a BBYO group for teens. When they married, Eddie still had two years of law school, and Fran became the breadwinner. Eddie graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto in 1970 and began his law career at Fogler Rubinoff. He became a partner within three years and helped to grow the firm from eight lawyers to more than 50.

After 15 years, Eddie left the practice and entered the business world. In the late 1980s and '90s, he was busy growing Counsel Property Corporation, and after 1989, winding it down.

In 1993, Eddie converted a small, struggling real estate mutual fund into one of Canada's first REITs. He took it public at the beginning of 1994, and by 1995, it had become RioCan. His mercurial rise in the business world is legendary.

Fran, a former elementary school teacher, has devoted her life to family and volunteer work, primarily in the Jewish community. Currently a national honorary vice-president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, she has contributed her talents to numerous organizations, including Mount Sinai Hospital, UJA Federation of Toronto's Jewish Foundation and CIJA (Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy).

She has helped raise funds for causes ranging from Aish HaTorah to the 1990 Baycrest Women's Auxiliary Gala and the 1999 Brazilian Ball, which raised $1.5 million for Baycrest.

Along with chairing conferences, conventions and serving as a mission leader to Israel, Fran has travelled across Canada as a Leadership Trainer.

In addition to his business success, Eddie is, among other communal activities, a past chair of the United Jewish Appeal Campaign in Toronto and currently serves as chair of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, the State of Israel Bonds Organization of Canada and the Real Estate Division of the United Way.

PROJECT NORTHERN RECOVERY

A Time to Rebuild Lives

The ceasefire between Israel and Hezbollah may be three months old, but for Michael and Leah Avshalom, the war has left a painful, lasting wound.

After the war had been raging for three weeks, the recently married Michael and Leah left the home that Michael had spent 10 years building in northern Rosh Pina for a car ride to check on the kibbutz pool where he worked.

Suddenly, on the quiet road, the couple heard a huge boom. It was a katyusha rocket falling in front of their car. In a split second, Michael had lost half of his leg. "I was in complete shock," says Leah, who was physically unscathed.

Today, Michael is unable to walk and incapable of working. It will take months before the bones in his leg even begin to heal.

Because of people like Michael and Leah, UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 is supporting a reinvigorated Fund for Victims of Terror, originally established during the intifada.

Project Northern Recovery, the next phase of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign, is also providing funds for trauma counseling, loans for small businesses on the brink of bankruptcy, and a new initiative encouraging northern families to stay in the area.

As Leah and Michael know so well, the emergency facing northern Israel isfar from over and critical needs remain.

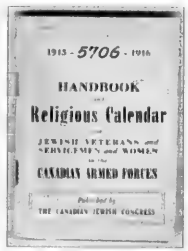
Jewish Life

A booklet of memory

for Jewish Veterans and Servicemen and Women in the Canadian Armed Forces was published by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in August 1945, and was intended to be distributed in time for the High Holy Days of 5706. It is a profoundly remarkable resource of information about the Jews of Canada and of the broader Jewish world. It is also a testament, at many levels, to the nationally inclusive and broadly effective institution under which the wide swath of Canadian Jewry was organized in 1945 and, more tellingly, to the patently obvious concern and respect that flowed for one another as a community from coast to coast.



Space does not permit listing all the sections in the 112-page booklet. It is a veritable library unto itself. I will therefore reproduce only samplings of parts of the historic and other significant materials that its pages contain.

The New Year's Message from the CJC national president, Samuel Bronfman, is the opening text. It is a marvel of literate and noble prose: "It is with solemn thankfulness that Canadian Jewry, for the first time in more than a decade of arduous struggle and sacrifice, now greets a New Year which leads on to the calmer, though no less challenging paths of peace… The cherished ideals of humanity have been preserved…

"Nor is Canadian Jewry, in its gratitude for victory, at all unmindful at what cost the salvation of mankind was won.

"Surely we owe it to their memory [millions who perished] that the world they died to make – a world of freedom and equality – should now move from promise to fulfilment."

After Bronfman's statement, there are statements of greeting from political and military dignitaries, the upcoming year's Jewish calendar with various calendar notes and explanations, and then an essay on Canada's Jews and the War Effort.

"Jewish fighting men have taken part in every campaign in which the dominion forces have been engaged.

"A report… issued by the CJC, points out that 'in 31 cities and towns throughout Canada, every one of the Jewish men of military age is in the services.' There is scarcely a Jewish home which has not given of its best to the military services and there are such as Rabbi Mazer of Ottawa who has seven sons in the armed forces, the Smiths of Ottawa, the Spiegelmans of Toronto, the Olfmans of Kamsack and the Kushners of Winnipeg who have five men in uniform.

"The Department of National Defence does not publish statistics on the racial or religious distribution of the men in the services… but the Bureau of War Records has verified the names of 16,559 Jewish men and women who served in the Canadian combat services as of July 19, 1945.

"Statistics on casualties among Jewish servicemen are as incomplete and as conservative as the figures on enlistments. Nevertheless, the Bureau of War Records listed 776 casualties… Of the total, 201 have been killed, 50 died, 80 are presumed dead, 70 are missing…"

"One hundred and twenty-two Jews… have received awards or decorations during the present conflict."

The booklet then lists all of them.

The booklet also contains essays on World Jewry in the War Against the Axis, and The Past Year in Canadian Jewry.

Appropriately, the last page is the Yizkor prayer, reminding us of the pre-eminent purpose of the booklet.

The Handbook and Religious Calendar

-MBD

From the editor's desk

Remembering – for its own sake and for the sake of taking action – has always been the current on which Jewish life has moved inexorably forward. Through centuries and millennia, trials and tribulations, the transmission from one generation to the next of the memory of our history has been the guarantor of Jewish survival.

Indeed, memory is also the instrument that guarantees the survival of the values, symbols and governing structures of our wider society, of all wider societies. At school, in the home and in the institutions of authority, those values are taught, reinforced, nurtured and ultimately cherished.

That is why the commemoration of Remembrance Day is so vital for the well-being and perpetuation of society.

Every individual who lives in Canada must acknowledge an almost ineffable but nevertheless deeply abiding moral debt to the soldiers who have fought and died for Canada and who continue to this day to fight and die under the colours of the Canadian flag.

These words were written mere hours after communities around the country formally marked Remembrance Day. Men and women in uniform. Men, women and children in civilian garb. Hymns of consolation. Words, perhaps, of inspiration. Tears. Stoicism. It is among the most poignantly human of our nation's – indeed any nation's – national ceremonies. For we see each other at our most emotionally vulnerable, and yet we resolve to help each other. In remembering the individuals who fought, who fell fighting and still fight today, we also remember the goodness that must flow through all our national purposes.

Leonard Levy of Toronto, a veteran of World War II, lent The CJN a tiny treasure, a small book whose pages are a shrine of memory, especially at this time of the year. They cannot help but steer the reader reverentially through the act of remembering.

A 'birthright' for adults?

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I'm back from the first of my three Kolel Learning Expeditions to Israel for 2006-07, and my reactions are much the same as they are every time I lead a group to Israel. There is always something new to see and more extraordinary people to meet. There is always a group bonding experience and good food. The Shabbat experience was tremendously spiritual, and the shopping was fabulous.

But every trip reinforces another, deeper feeling, and it is much more uncomfortable than even the 12-hour flight. Each time I return, I remember that most unaffiliated Jews have little or no relationship to Israel, and little or no desire to go. Israel does not draw them in; they don't plan trips, and they need to be convinced that it is not only safe, but also fun.

We who are active in Jewish life in some way (and if you are reading The CJN, you are, trust me, already there, or at least close) find it easy to say people should go to Israel even in difficult times. We choose Israel over Florida or the Caribbean. But this is not the case with people on the margins of involvement.

The pride in Israel we felt growing up in the '60s and '70s is ancient history to a lot of people today. It's too long ago and there have been been too many years, too much politics, too many wars and terrorist bombs, too many travel advisories, too many uncomfortable questions around the water-cooler at work.

How do we engage those who have not felt any connection to Israel, who have not visited, and who do not feel the ancient tie, the primal calling to a place that seems so far away? How do I begin to explain the feeling of walking in the footsteps of your ancestors? How do I describe the smell of Jerusalem on a Friday afternoon? How do I share the thrill of biblical quotations on the buses telling you to give up your seat to the elderly? How do we do any of these things with Jews who feel disengaged from the whole enterprise of Israel and even more disengaged from Jewish life here at home?

So I have an idea, but it costs too much. For years, I have dreamed of a "birthright"-type program for unaffiliated adults. Yes – a free trip for every adult who is still uninvolved with the Jewish community. And a free trip for every "new Jew" who converts to Judaism. The only cost would be a promise of some future involvement in a Jewish institution of some sort. The trip would be a sort of "welcome home" gift. I can guarantee as dramatic a result as with the kids who go on birthright. Maybe even more dramatic, as those who participated begin to spread the word of Israel's spiritual beauty, and their new connection to it, at work and at home.

In the meantime, I will continue to lead groups for those who can afford it and already have the inclination to go, but I'm preaching to the choir. There are still a whole lot of people who don't know the tune, and I sure wish I could teach it to them.

Taxing trusts

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The economic news of the past week has focused on the new rules regarding the taxation of income trusts. No longer will these popular vehicles be able to distribute their earnings tax free, and they will now be treated like all other corporations paying taxes on earnings. While Canadians debate the impact and appropriateness of such reversal of government policy, what might Jewish ethics say about this?

Issues of tax policy have long engendered much debate and disagreement. While it is only in our generation that we have a Jewish state faced with such questions, in reality, Jewish communities in the pre-modern period also had to constantly grapple with these issues.

Jews granted autonomy would collect taxes to fund Jewish communal life as well as paying taxes to the non-Jewish governments for the right of residence. Yet surprisingly, there is relatively little in our sources outlining a systematic approach to the levying of the tax burden.

Jewish law granted much latitude to design a tax system based on local conditions. This is readily understandable, as Jewish monetary law operates on a different system than does "religious" or even criminal law. Whereas the latter is a fixed and potentially rigid system of law – allowing for interpretation only – the former can be abrogated and modified with the agreement of those involved. For example, though the Torah obligates an employer to pay a worker every day, the employee may waive his right to such prompt payment.

On a communal level, an even more powerful mechanism is in place – hefker beit din din hefker – the courts may declare all monies ownerless and thus at the mercy of the government to do with as it pleases. This power must be used to promote communal welfare and not to enrich the state or certain members of the state. Thus, in essence, any taxes declared by a legitimate government, Jewish or non-Jewish, are morally legitimate.

What Jewish law demands, however, is that the taxes be fair and consistently applied. Discriminatory taxes are immoral taxes. While such discriminatory taxes are extremely rare in the democratic societies of the western world, we who reside in Ontario are witness to one such immoral tax policy. While a government has the right to fund only a public school education system, it does not have the moral or even legal (at least from a Jewish perspective) right to fund one religious system to the exclusion of others.

While many may argue about the definition of fair taxes, non-discriminatory tax policies of a democratically elected government, almost by definition, would meet the fairness criterion. Nonetheless, Jewish teaching would seem to indicate that fairness is best achieved by minimizing the numbers of special exemptions, credits, etc. in the tax system. The present tax code, with its myriad of rules, exceptions and exceptions to exceptions, while absolutely binding, runs the risk of potentially unfair treatment of certain segments of the population.

A Jewish tax system should try to eliminate differing rules for different sectors. Thus, equalizing the tax treatment of investment trusts and corporations would appear to be the proper thing to do. One may even argue that Jewish values might tend to look favourably on a flat tax system with all forms of income being taxed at a similar rate. This would be similar to our charity obligations where, with exceptions for the extremely poor and extremely wealthy, one is expected to donate between 10 and 20 per cent of one's earnings, regardless of what they may be. Determining what that rate might be would be decided based on the priorities and values that society would like to promote.

Jewish war veterans, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at the sites that honour Jewish soldiers from Canada and the United States. Today, we continue our look at Jewish veterans from armies around the world.

Long before the establishment of the State of Israel, Jewish soldiers in Palestine volunteered to do their part in World War I and World War II. The Jewish Legion and the Zion Mule Corps were British army battalions that fought in Palestine in World War I against the Ottoman Empire. The legion saw action in June 1918 in the Jordan Valley. Notable legion members include Gershon Agron, mayor of Jerusalem, and David Grün, later known as David Ben-Gurion. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jewish_Legion]

When war struck Europe again, the Jewish community in the British Mandate of Palestine lobbied to set up a Jewish fighting unit as part of the British army. The Jewish Brigade was formed in September 1944 and included 5,000 Jewish volunteers from Palestine. [www.veterans.org.il/?p=2] (I have previously focused on Yom Hazikaron, the day of remembrance for Israel's fallen soldiers. [http://tinyurl.com/ye7cjb])

Although they did not belong to a national army, I want to acknowledge the Jewish partisans who fought during World War II. The Jewish Partisan Education Foundation has created a marvellous site to honour the 30,000 Jews who joined hundreds of thousands of non-Jewish partisans to fight the Nazis through both physical resistance and what the site calls "spiritual resistance." [www.jewishpartisans.org/]

In Britain, the Association of Jewish Ex-Servicemen and Women had its origins in 1921 with the creation of the League of Old Judeans. This coming Nov. 19, the association is planning its 72nd annual remembrance ceremony and parade at the Cenotaph in Whitehall with the participation of British Chief Rabbi Sir Jonathan Sacks. [www.ajex.org.uk/]

In France, l'Association des Anciens Combattants et Engagés Volontaires Juifs was created in 1953. It has lobbied for veterans' rights, served as a social network for veterans and has urged Jewish veterans to publicize their role in defending their nation. The site has extensive photo galleries, including photographs of a joint memorial ceremony with British veterans at the Arc de Triomphe. [www.aacevj.fr/]

In Australia, I found several moving articles about Sir John Monash whom the Australian Jewish News calls "an Australian military icon and one of Australia's greatest Jews." Praised for his superior tactical skills, "Monash masterminded the decisive 1918 offensive on Amiens, which ushered in the Battle of the Somme and helped break Germany's Hindenburg Line, turning the tide for the Allies." His home city of Melbourne has a university and a highway for him, and Monash appears on the Australian $100 bill. [http://tinyurl.com/yh8vta]

The International Council of Jewish War Veterans was established in 1976 and represents Jewish veterans from around the world. [www.icjwv.org/] You can read more about the role of Jewish soldiers in South Africa [http://tinyurl.com/yaz3kc] and in European armies during World War II [http://tinyurl.com/kx2h8] including Russia [http://tinyurl.com/jd663] and Poland. [http://tinyurl.com/yf7c76]

In 1985, Yad Vashem erected a memorial to the approximately 1.5 million Jews who fought against the Nazis. The monument is formed by six blocks whose edges are arranged to create a Star of David. The Star is dissected by a large blade that symbolizes the opposition to the Nazis. The monument bears the following inscription in several languages: "Glory be to the Jewish soldiers and partisans who fought against Nazi Germany." [http://tinyurl.com/fc2yh]

And this summer, the Jewish National Fund announced construction of a Wall of Honor where friends and family can purchase a plaque "to honour a Jewish soldier who served or serves in the military of any country… [and] to show the world Jews' courage, heroism and sacrifice through their contributions to armed forces throughout the world and throughout time." The Wall of Honor will be situated at Jerusalem's Ammunition Hill, site of a key battle in the 1967 Six Day War that led to the city's reunification. The wall is scheduled to be unveiled in May 2007. [http://tinyurl.com/yewofa]

Centenarian maintains strong sense of humor

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Helen Weinberg must have had many people wish her life until 120, because she's closing in on the mark.

Last Oct. 22 the feisty and sharp bubbie of 22 grandchildren and great-grandchildren turned 100.

When asked what she did to get this far, Weinberg doesn't hesitate, "I had a lot of sex. It makes me live longer," she said. Then she giggled mischievously, her sense of humour well intact.

Sitting nearby, her 52-year-old granddaughter Elaine and daughter-in-law Betty Geiger shook their heads, laughing.

"She's always like this," Elaine said.

"I would have more [sex], only I can't find anybody," countered Weinberg.

Now residing at Kensington Place retirement residence in Toronto, Weinberg led a globetrotting life.

Her survival skills were forged early in life. She remembers her family fleeing their shtetl of Ozarow, Poland, in 1915 as it was razed to the ground by the Russian army during World War I.

They returned one week later to rebuild their home.

She immigrated to Toronto from Ozarow in 1929, reuniting with her husband, Sam, who had come over to find fortune as a shoe repairman.

"I guess he decided to [sponsor] me here because he couldn't find anyone prettier to marry," Weinberg said, laughing.

Once here, Weinberg did everything she could to ensure her family's well being.

She vowed to sponsor her remaining nine family members in Poland over to America no matter what it took. And she succeeded, working tirelessly to save for their eventual reunion in Canada soon after.

Though she didn't know it at the time, her efforts spared her immediate family from the scourge of the Nazis, who would send most of Ozarow's Jews to Treblinka.

Weinberg worked for Tip Top Tailors in the late 1930s as an expert seamstress before becoming an entrepreneur.

In a time when women were scoffed at for doing anything outside the kitchen, she thrived on business.

With an eye for a good deal, Weinberg became an astute real estate negotiator, buying and selling properties in Toronto and Los Angeles throughout her younger years.

"I loved being in business," said Weinberg. "I still miss it."

Weinberg is also a dual citizen, having lived in the United States for 20 years, dividing her time between Los Angeles and Miami.

After Sam died in 1986, she returned to Canada because she felt it was her real home, "the place where I came first," she said.

Weinberg remarried briefly in 1994.

Of her many achievements over the years, one thing stands out above the rest: her children.

"The education that I gave them… that's my greatest accomplishment," she said.

Helen Weinberg holds court at Kensington Place retirement residence. From left are Weinberg's granddaughter, Elaine; Weinberg's caregiver, Joyce Kerr; Weinberg; and Weinberg's daughter-in-law, Betty Geiger. [Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo] Inset: Helen Weinberg in 1925 at the age of 19.

She had four children, three sons and one daughter. Her daughter, Shirley, succumbed to pneumonia at the age of four.

Her sons Norman, Stanley and Jack, an electro-chemist, inventor and businessman respectively, all went on to successful careers.

Though her husband and Jack both passed away 20 years ago, Weinberg's indomitable spirit persists and brings joy to others.

Up until two years ago she was still living independently, cooking, cleaning and entertaining at her home. But in 2004 the family decided it would be best for Helen to be cared for.

Joyce Kerr, Weinberg's caregiver, marvelled at the senior's joie de vivre.

"She cracks me up," said Kerr. "When I'm feeling down, I can count on her to make a joke. You never know what she'll say."

Weinberg plays bingo, watches movies and enjoys the general entertainment provided at her retirement home. But true to her impish spirit, one of her biggest thrills remains shocking her physician.

"I always tell the doctor I feel OK, but I think I'm pregnant," she said.

May she live to 120.

A CELEBRATION OF TORONTO'S FINEST WOMAN

Shawna Spiegelman
FSWC-Events Coordinator

The scene at the recent Woman of Valour Luncheon in Toronto—a fundraiser for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies—was like a scene at a high profile fashion show. Hosted at Debbie & Warren Kimel's fabulous home, almost four hundred people, mostly woman, comfortably packed the stunning tent. The guests enjoyed an elegant lunch while honouring the three remarkable and accomplished 2006 Woman of Valour Honourees; Carole Grafstein, Elise Kalles and Pauline Menkes. The honourees spoke about what it means to them to be a Woman of Valour.

Event Co-chairs Anna Koffler and Helene Korn welcomed Toronto's finest woman to this charity event and thanked Committee Chair, Barb Silverberg. Gord Martineau, City TV Anchor hosted the celebration. 2006 Woman of Valour keynote speaker, Bonnie Fuller, delivered a speech that emphasized the important work of the late Simon Wiesenthal. Malka Green, who sits on the Wiesenthal Canadian Board of Directors, thanked Bonnie Fuller for her delightful speech.

"Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies carries out the work of the Wiesenthal Center in Canada by bringing antisemitism, bigotry, racial hatred and ethnic intolerance to the attention of the Canadian Government, the public and the media," explained Avi Benlolo, Canadian FSWC President & CEO.

The event raised more than $230 thousand for the work of FSWC.

Reserve your tickets now for the November 29th screening of The Life and Legacy of Simon Wiesenthal.

We thank the following sponsors who participated in the 2006 Woman of Valour Luncheon and who have generously supported Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Holocaust Education Week

U.S. leaders blamed for failure to save more Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

A timid, frightened and ego-driven Jewish leadership of the day must share blame with an uncaring government for the United States' failure to save more Jews during World War II, a leading American authority said last week.

Fear of alienating then-U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt and of stoking more anti-Semitism handcuffed Jewish leaders from doing more to rescue European Jews, author Rafael Medoff told an audience at Beth Avraham Joseph of Toronto Congregation as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Medoff's appearance also marked this year's reissue of The Scared and the Doomed – the Jewish Establishment vs. the Six Million, journalist Myer Nurenberger's 1985 book, which castigated war-era American Jewish leaders as unable to put aside their differences and turf wars to work together and pressure Washington to do more to save Jews.

The Polish-born Nurenberger, who founded The CJN in 1960, had been a newspaperman in prewar Belgium and was "shocked" by the support Adolf Hitler enjoyed among the working class, Medoff related. A disillusioned Nurenberger immigrated to the United States in 1939 and became a writer for the Yiddish press in New York.

Nurenberger saw no conflict in participating in, as well as covering, rallies in support of Europe's Jews. "His loyalties as a Jew drove him," said Medoff, director of the Washington, D.C.-based David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies and author of seven books on the Holocaust, Zionism and U.S. Jewry.

> 'Jewish leaders were scared of antagonizing the president and stirring up more anti-Semitism'

Medoff drew an alarming picture of both American Jewish leaders and an indifferent government of the day.

In August 1942, the respected and influential Rabbi Stephen Wise received a now-famous telegram from Gerhart Riegner, the World Jewish Congress representative in Switzerland, warning of the Nazis' plans to exterminate Jews.

The U.S. administration tried to prevent Wise from receiving the message. "Roosevelt regarded the plight of Jews as a minor part of the war," Medoff said.

But the telegram did reach Rabbi Wise, who alerted the State Department. Later, the rabbi said Washington needed more time to assess the situation, Medoff noted.

The following month, U.S. Jewish leaders met in New York to discuss another telegram, this one detailing the mass deportations and murder of 100,000 Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto. Again, Rabbi Wise said nothing should be done until the State Department acted.

"Jewish leaders like [Rabbi] Wise were scared of antagonizing the president and of stirring up more anti-Semitism," Medoff said. "Some leaders wanted to keep a low profile."

They were also caught up in a mindset of "who will lead? Who gets the applause?" Medoff stated. In the end, "the silence of the Jewish leadership left a vacuum."

The void was filled by Peter Bergson, born Hillel Kook, a militant Revisionist Zionist emissary from Palestine to the United States, and outspoken advocate for the rescue of European Jewry. Nurenberger quickly became part of the so-called Bergson Group.

The no-nonsense Bergson "had his priorities straight," Medoff said. "It's not hard to see why Nurenberger was drawn to this group. These were Jews who were not scared."

The Bergson Group lobbied unabashedly on several fronts. Its primary goal was to mobilize support for the Irgun, the military arm of Ze'ev Jabotinsky's Revisionist Zionist movement. But it also presented the U.S. government with detailed plans on how European Jews could be rescued, "shattering the myth that the only way to save Jews was by winning the war," Medoff said.

The group's most effective tactic was taking out 200 large advertisements in U.S. newspapers between 1941 and 1945 that drew much attention to the plight of Europe's Jews. It also helped organize, with help from Hollywood stars such as Eddie Cantor and Ben Hecht, a dramatic pageant, We Will Never Die, that described the Nazi slaughter of Jews in painful detail. It was seen by 100,000 Americans.

In late 1943, the Bergson advocates implored Roosevelt to establish a special office for war refugees. In January 1944, the president unilaterally set up the U.S. War Refugee Board "as a gesture," according to Medoff, and gave it almost no funding.

Nevertheless, the board "played a central role" in rescuing at least 200,000 European Jews through evacuations and diplomatic pressure. Medoff quoted Nurenberger's dissatisfied reaction: "It was six million too late." Even so, the Bergson Group "changed policy." And Nurenberger, who died in 2001 in Toronto, "had qualities all too lacking in Jewish leadership today."

Nurenberger's book notes that the reissue was made possible with support from Sabina Citron, whose complaints led to the prosecution of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel in the 1980s.

Medoff was introduced by Nurenberger's daughter, Atara Beck.

Lecturer faults media coverage of genocide

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Amanda Grzyb switched on an overhead projector and displayed one of her slides. It was chosen, she said, to illustrate the way people in the West tend to "look away" from genocide.

The slide, a copy of a page from a 1994 issue of the Globe and Mail, highlighted a news story from Rwanda with the headline, "UN leaving thousands to die." On the same page, Grzyb pointed out, was an advertisement for Thomas Keneally's Schindler's List, the book that inspired the hit movie about the Nazis' destruction of the Jews and Oscar Schindler's efforts to save his Jewish workers.

The juxtaposition of the two items shows that "again and again, the West does not protect victims or intervene to prevent genocide," she said.

Grzyb, a lecturer in the faculty of information and media studies at the University of Western Ontario, said that even today, the government of Sudan is assisting a "genocide in slow motion" in its western region of Darfur, where as many as 400,000 have already been killed and two to three million displaced.

"The situation is absolutely dire at this point in terms of the need for international intervention," she said. "Why have we been bystanders to genocide again and again?"

Grzyb, an instructor at the Romeo Dallaire Genocide Institute, was addressing a gathering at Ryerson University on the topic Media, Genocide and Public Responsibility. Her presentation was part of the 26th annual Holocaust Education Week.

Grzyb asserted that the "media can be a tool for inciting and facilitating genocide and a tool for genocide prevention and intervention." She compared media treatments of the Holocaust and the Rwandan genocide, showing how during the run-up to both events, the media in Germany and Rwanda demonized Jews and Tutsis, respectively, setting the stage for their murder.

As early as June 1942, the New York Times reported that 700,000 Jews had been killed in shootings, concentration camps and gas chambers, she said. Throughout the war, the Times reported practically every other day on the genocide, yet the stories were often buried in the middle of the paper. There were never lead stories or editorials about the issue and most often, the stories didn't even refer to the Nazis' victims as Jews.

Using the Globe and Mail to illustrate coverage of the Rwanda genocide, Grzyb said the paper generally reported on the African nation in its World in Brief section and it usually used wire stories, not its own reports.

While the slaughter was going on, the longest story on Rwanda was a travel piece that featured the country's mountain gorillas. Globe stories also focused on the foreign evacuation at the outset of the killings while downplaying the actual murders.

It also wrongly framed the story in terms of tribal warfare, she added.

Grzyb suggested the mainstream media declined to run stories about the Rwandan slaughter, while TV news in particular aimed its coverage at "the lowest common denominator" – focusing on the O.J. Simpson case and the Tonya Harding controversy instead.

She laid some of the blame for that on the public, which ate up the celebrity-focused coverage. The public, she continued, never communicated to the poll-sensitive White House there was any widespread concern about Rwanda.

Grzyb argued that for both the Holocaust and Rwanda, media coverage was inadequate, lacked proper historical context and didn't focus on the important events taking place.

She said the failure of the mainstream media to properly cover these stories has led activist groups to turn to the Internet as an alternative. People today get their information from blogs (web journals), YouTube and other Internet resources, she said.

Documentary tells little-known story

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A large number of Jews are now living and flourishing in Venezuela, thanks to the efforts, 67 years ago, of Isack Kohn, then president of the Jewish community, says his daughter Dr. Kia Kohn de Merenfeld.

Kohn de Merenfeld spoke at Temple Sinai as part of Holocaust Education Week, after screening Ships of Hope, a documentary produced by Elizabeth Mundlak and directed by Jonathan Jakubowicz in 2000, that describes a little-known episode of the Holocaust.

The documentary tells the story of two ships full of mostly Austrian Jewish refugees, the Caribia and the Koenigstein, which were allowed to disembark in Venezuela in 1939, after being denied permission in various ports in the Caribbean and the Guyanas.

Kohn de Merenfeld said that when the ships approached Venezuela, her father, president of Union Israelia de Caracas – he emigrated from Poland in 1929 – brought the case to then-Venezuelan president Lopez Contreras, who gave his permission for the ships to disembark at two Venezuelan ports.

Before the refugees were allowed to leave the ship, she said, some of them were so afraid that they would be sent back to Europe that they planned on jumping.

Sephardi Jews also suffered in Shoah, film shows

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In an effort to dispel the myth that Sephardi Jews in North Africa were untouched by the Holocaust, a documentary screening and discussion was held earlier this month as part of the 26th annual Holocaust Education Week.

Some 200 people came to the Sephardic Kehila Centre to watch Part 1 of a two-part documentary titled A Matter of Time: From Tripoli to Bergen Belsen. The discussion afterward was led by Rabbi Amram Assayag.

The Israeli film, directed by Marco Carmel, tells the story of the Jews of Libya, then an Italian colony, from 1940 to 1942, after Italy declared war against Britain and France, and it provides testimony of Holocaust survivors from the region.

The survivors shared memories of life after the Italians imposed anti-Jewish laws, seized Jewish property and placed Jews in a ghetto.

Most of the Jews were eventually sent to Jado, a concentration camp in their own country, where many died from diseases such as typhoid, but hundreds were also sent to Bergen Belsen.

The film argues that if the war had gone on longer, North African Jews would have suffered the same fate as European Jews.

"There is a myth that Sephardic Jewry was not in any way affected during the Holocaust," Rabbi Assayag said.

"First of all, we were all affected by the fact that six million of our brothers and sisters died. Jewish communities of North Africa were affected… people were taken from their homes, put in jails and people's properties were confiscated," he added.

Greek community suffered same fate as Europeans

He said that although the film focuses on the Sephardi community in Libya, others were affected as well, such as the Greek community of Salonika.

"This community was made up of 50,000 Jews. They were deported to Auschwitz and the entire community of 50,000 Sephardic Jews was taken, and they suffered the same consequences [as European Jews]," Rabbi Assayag said.

After the Germans invaded Greece in 1941, by the following year, they put about 10,000 Jews in forced labour.

In 1943, almost the entire community of 50,000 Jews was sent to the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

After the film, Rabbi Assayag said that Jews were not completely safe anywhere in the world 60 years ago, and Jews aren't safe anywhere in the world today, even in Canada.

"We thought that anti-Semitism wouldn't rear its head in Canada [so soon after the Holocaust], but unfortunately, it's coming much too fast in Canada, faster than any sociologist would have thought. That is the sad part," he said.

"Some people believed that it would take hundreds of years before there would be any anti-Semitism in the world."

He said Jews should consider themselves safe in Canada, but no one should sit back and think that a Holocaust will never happen again.

"It may be happening in other parts of the world. They are telling us that it is happening in other parts of the world, like Sudan," he said, adding that we have to "defend the victims of that Holocaust."

He added: "One has to be forewarned and understand that the only place that we can be safe is Eretz Yisrael. It is our homeland, it is where we belong and it is the only place where we have the strength to defend ourselves."

'His legacy is that he touched many lives through his actions'

"Even though my father had vertigo and was not supposed to be on moving objects, he intervened and went on board to stop them."

"His legacy – he died at age 58 – is that he touched many lives through his actions. Today in Venezuela, the children and grandchildren of these 252 Jews are grateful citizens."

Contreras is also remembered, she said, as a "humanitarian who granted asylum to the victims of Hitler's fury."

Her father often told her that "when every other country closes its doors on us, Venezuela welcomed us with open arms."

Ships of Hope is a testament to her father's memory and to the memory of all Holocaust victims, said Kohn de Merenfeld. "Today, there are many Holocaust deniers, so any testament is important.

"We need to teach the new generation the bitter truth. We have to make them aware of what has been, and what we won't let happen."

Ships of Hope tells a "heartbreaking story that has a happy ending. It raises the hope of the future of mankind," she said.

Jewish Book Fair

Censors vetted book about Israel's nuclear capabilty

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

With the full approval of Israeli military censors, Michael Karpin has shattered a taboo of Israeli public life by writing a penetrating examination of the history, scope and significance of Israel's usually secret nuclear capability.

Fours years after he co-produced an Israeli television documentary on the subject, the well-known Israeli journalist has published The Bomb in the Basement: How Israel Went Nuclear and What That Means for the World (Simon & Schuster).

The keynote speaker of this year's Jewish Book Fair, Karpin gave a riveting talk about Israel's nuclear project to a full house at the Leah Posluns Theatre on Nov. 4.

Without once directly stating that Israel possesses a nuclear bomb – an admission that would violate both Israel's longstanding "policy of ambiguity" as well as its criminal code – Karpin presented a highly revealing discussion that yet remained within the strictures of the permissible.

Even highly placed politicians such as Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, interested in setting down a correct historical record, co-operated fully with Karpin in his research once he assured them he would likewise co-operate fully with the censors. The documentary and the book that later followed, he promised, "would be submitted to the army censors, and if rejected, would lie waiting in the safe until the messiah will come to redeem it."

Sketching a history of the secretive project, Karpin explained that it was France, not the United States, that first aided Israel's entry into the nuclear club in the 1950s. In exchange for the nuclear know-how that allowed it to build a nuclear reactor in Dimona in the Negev desert, Israel supplied France with much-needed intelligence on the anti-colonial rebels behind the bloody insurrection in Algeria. Israel also joined France and Great Britain in the 1956 Suez War against Egypt.

While then-U.S. president John F. Kennedy opposed Israel's nuclear project, his successor, Lyndon Johnson, approved it tacitly, Karpin said. "The big change came with Richard Nixon – or better to say with his secretary [of state] Henry Kissinger – when they made a historical decision to grant legitimacy to Israel's nuclear plan." (Nixon and Kissinger also approved of India's nuclear ambitions, since both countries were friendly democratic allies.)

Israel never signed a nuclear non-proliferation treaty and has never wavered in its intention to keep its nuclear arsenal a secret, unlike modern rogue states like Korea and Iran, which generally shout each stage of their nuclear progress from the rooftops.

"Even in deep crises like the Yom Kippur War of 1973, Israel always avoided the temptation to warn its enemies that it possesses nuclear capability," Karpin said. ("It didn't happen," he replied when asked about rumours that Israel had signalled a nuclear alert during the 1973 war.)

As to Iran, Israel will never allow it to acquire nuclear weapons, said Karpin, indicating that Israel believes Iran is still two or three years away from reaching that goal.

'It is a weapon of last resort'

"There is no chance that Israel will reconcile itself to living with nuclear threats from the ayatollahs," he said. "Iran's leaders are raising the question why Israel is permitted to have what Iran is forbidden. The main difference between the two is that Iran's nuclear capability makes headline news, while Israel's nuclear capability remains hidden in the shadows.

"Israel's nuclear capability is a bomb in the basement. It's a [purely defensive] weapon of last resort."

Israel would like a diplomatic solution to the Iranian threat and, failing that, would prefer to see the United States forcefully confront Iran, Karpin said. But he acknowledged that the United States may be unable to punish Iran because of its prolonged messy involvement in Iraq.

Israel, then, would have no option but to act unilaterally, he speculated, and would do so in full consultation with Washington and perhaps even Moscow, Ottawa and other world capitals.

"The decision is around the corner, next year or the year later," he said. "Someone will have to decide."

Iran has scattered its nuclear program over more than 100 sites in order to minimize the impact of a military attack, he noted.

"I personally don't think that Israel has the capability to abolish the Iranian nuclear program, but it can perhaps do something – I'm being very careful because I wouldn't like to speak about operational patterns – to delay the program, and this to Israel is very important. If they could delay it by three to five years, I think it will be a very successful operation."

Karpin defended Israel's right to possess nuclear weapons, seeing that it faces an explicit existential threat of annihilation, and described its policy of ambiguity as a success. During a question period, he rebuffed the suggestion that his book might harm Israeli national interests, asserting it would have little or no effect on a national nuclear weapons program in Iran planned over a timetable of years or decades.

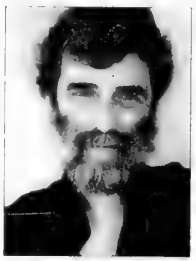
His talk was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University in conjunction with the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Palestinian problem still Israel's chief concern: journalist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The recent war in Lebanon deflected Israel's attention away from the "central problem" of the Arab-Israeli dispute, the future of the West Bank, an Israeli journalist said last week at the Toronto Jewish Book Fair.

Delivering the fourth annual Harvey Yalonetsky Memorial Lecture under the sponsorship of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, Gershom Gorenberg suggested that Israel's perennial conflict with the Palestinians should be its chief concern today.



Gershom Gorenberg

Gorenberg, the author of The Accidental Empire: Israel and the Birth of the Settlements, 1967-1977, urged Israel to resume talks with the Palestinians without trying to foist its vision of an agreement on them.

For demographic reasons, he noted, Israel should state clearly that it supports partition and a two-state solution.

Speaking only hours after the Israeli army completed its latest incursion into the Gaza Strip to stop the barrage of Qassam rocket fire into Israel, he said that the current political deadlock can be broken if a stable agreement is reached with the Palestinians and Israeli building activity ceases in the West Bank.

"I make this argument out of concern for the future of our country," said Gorenberg, a former Jerusalem Report editor and currently Jerusalem correspondent of the Forward.

He called on the Israeli government to encourage the formation of a Palestinian unity government to supplant the current Hamas regime. Once this happens, Israel can reopen bilateral negotiations with the Palestinians, he said. "Returning to the path of diplomacy is essential for Israel."

Israel should not attempt to impose its will on the Palestinians through unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank, he added, saying that Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza last year only emboldened Arab extremists.

In Gorenberg's view, Israel would have strengthened the hand of Palestinian moderates had the Gaza disengagement been the result of negotiations.

Gorenberg claimed that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert deployed massive force in last summer's war with Hezbollah to save the concept of unilateral withdrawal from oblivion.

Alluding to the now-dormant Oslo peace accords, Gorenberg said that the shape of an Arab-Israeli agreement has been clear for years. Should there be a final status agreement, Israel will probably have to give up most of its settlements in the West Bank to accommodate a sovereign Palestinian state.

According to Gorenberg, 70 out of 120 Knesset members would support the dismantlement of some or all the settlements.

Saying that they were the direct outcome of the 1967 Six Day War, Gorenberg reminded the audience that Israel was completely surprised by its outbreak. Israeli intelligence officials had been certain that a war would not erupt for at least a decade. But by war's end, Israel found itself in control of a huge swath of Arab territory.

Within weeks of its victory, Israel secretly offered to withdraw from the territories in exchange for peace. But Arab states rejected Israel's offer, and Israel dug in, hoping to use its acquisition of that land as a bargaining chip.

In the meantime, though, the Israeli government quietly established military outposts, which evolved into full-blown settlements in the West Bank, the Golan Heights, the Sinai Peninsula and Gaza.

Contrary to conventional wisdom, the first Jewish settlement in the territories was established not in the West Bank but on the Golan, he disclosed.

"Small decisions led to the spread of the settlements and the blurring of the border," he observed, saying that maps published in Israel after the war erased the old Green Line, which demarcated the 1949 frontier.

Gorenberg said that Israeli leaders from Levi Eshkol to Yigal Allon were compulsively swept up by the Zionist allure of creating facts on the ground.

Declaring that he wanted a Jewish state with a Jewish majority, Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, rejected a plan to conquer the West Bank. Many of his contemporaries, resigned to the loss of the West Bank in the War of Independence, concurred with his judgment. But Ben-Gurion's successors dispensed with his policy and built settlements by stealth.

Being concerned by demographic imperatives, some important Israeli politicians were reluctant to commit funds for settlements in the territories. But on balance, both secular and religious Israeli Jews, as well as right-wing and left-wing Jews, embraced the settlement project, he said.

By his count, the West Bank, excluding eastern Jerusalem, is home to about 250,000 Israeli Jews today. "Getting out will be very difficult," he warned.

Gorenberg said that Israel should seriously consider a 2002 Arab League peace plan, which Israel has rebuffed as a nonstarter. Under the proposal, Israel would cede the territories and agree to a resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem in exchange for Arab recognition of Israel's existence.

Cancer like a gift in barbed wire: doctor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

There is a big difference between luck and chance, says Dr. Marla Shapiro, a physician, television personality, author and columnist.

Speaking last Sunday at the 30th annual Jewish Book Fair, Shapiro, author of Life in the Balance, My Journey with Breast Cancer, said that "luck is what life gives you; chance is what you do with the luck you get."

Originally from Montreal, Shapiro, a wife and mother of three, was diagnosed with invasive breast cancer two years ago. "Was I lucky life gave me breast cancer? A lot of people would say [no], but it became a chance for me to do something with it."

Cancer is like a gift in barbed wire, she said. "[I've learned] that life is nothing more than a journey. [Arriving at] the destination means it's over. There is no question that I am still along the journey.

"When life seems overwhelming, I now have the ability to take a deep breath and keep well the road. My diagnosis has changed me for the better."

Unable to practise medicine while undergoing chemotherapy, Shapiro said she recognized that a large part of her would be taken away. "Much of my life had been defined by what I do. Who I am had become interchangeable with what I did, and that was taken away from me when I couldn't work.

"Chemotherapy diminished my white blood-cell count and rendered me susceptible to infection. I couldn't [see patients.]

"No number of years caring for patients could educate [me] on a first-hand basis to what chemotherapy is like. It was clear as I went through treatment that I [had always been very concerned] about my patients, but there is so much we don't talk about."

The first time she appeared on national television without her wig, she was "absolutely astounded" by the number of letters she got from people with cancer who said it was empowering to see a bald woman on television.

"The first time my son saw I was wearing a baseball cap, he looked at the floor and said, 'Don't take off your hat, you're scaring me.' I went to my room and shut the door. I was hysterical. I stayed away from him."

Her book chronicles her treatment decisions, she said, but it is also a shared journey about what happened to her family along the way. "It is a book about living my life mindfully. Being a mother, a wife, a daughter, a friend, all fit in with each other. Each part of the puzzle [makes] my life stronger.

"A lot of us delude ourselves that the time we spend with our family is quality time. We don't name the time we don't spend with our family."

Canadian students travel to northern Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About a dozen Canadians rode the "MASA Train to the North" on their way late last month from Jerusalem to Akko, where they joined hundreds of other volunteers in a solidarity event for Israelis who were affected by last summer's war with Hezbollah.

MASA, which means journey in Hebrew, is a three-year-old joint project of the government of Israel, the Jewish Agency for Israel and North American Jewish federations that aims to bring thousands of young Jews to Israel to participate in educational volunteer programs.

Elan Ezrachi, executive director of MASA and the organizer of the event, said the ride was his organization's way of welcoming MASA participants to Israel, some of whom had arrived in the country only weeks before.

"First of all, these events have to be creative and fun for the participants," he said, adding that 1,000 people rode the train, which was leased from an Israeli train corporation.

During the three-hour ride to Akko, MASA volunteers were treated to live music, dancing and performances.

MASA volunteers were treated to performances from drummers during their three-hour train ride from Jerusalem to Akko.

Soldiers and guides also travelled on the train to share their experiences and answer students' questions.

"After they arrived in Akko, they were joined by the other 1,500 participants, who came by buses, and they had a street fair in Akko where they decorated parts of the city and marched in the streets," Ezrachi said.

Ben Kreuter, 18, a Vaughan Secondary School graduate from Thornhill, Ont., arrived in Israel two months ago as part of a nine-month program run by Canadian Young Judea in association with MASA.

He said the event in Akko was a great way for young Jews from all over the world to come together to support Israel.

"All of the MASA volunteers came together in Akko. There were Americans, Canadians and British people, and we heard speeches. It was basically a way to get all the MASA volunteers together," he said, adding that he and his friends took the opportunity to tour the city and shop in its shuk (market).

Ezrachi estimated that 400 Canadians will take part in a MASA program this year, and he guessed that 100 Canadians were at the recent Akko celebration.

Later in the day, the street party turned into a rally that included speeches by Akko Mayor Shimon Lankri and Ze'ev Bielski, chairman of the Jewish Agency.

"The idea was to show strength and support to the tourist industry in the north because of the devastation to the economy," Ezrachi said.

"Buying an ice cream isn't going to save the north, but it was a symbolic show of support."

The rally included a tribute to Michael Levine, a former MASA volunteer who made aliyah and was killed fighting in Lebanon.

"One of the soldiers who was killed in the war was an alumni of one of our programs… We brought a friend of his, another kid from the States who made aliyah, and he gave a kind of eulogy and it was very moving… There was complete silence when this guy was talking about his friend," Ezrachi said.

There was also a tribute to all the soldiers and civilians who were killed in the war, and the kidnapped soldiers who are still being held captive.

As much as Kreuter enjoyed the celebration organized by MASA, he said he's very serious about the volunteering he does as part of the program.

"So far, I've volunteered for a month-and-a-half on an organic farm, and currently I'm volunteering at a residence home for disabled people in Netanya," Kreuter said.

"This is my first time being in Israel and the most rewarding part is that they set you up with great places to volunteer, and I feel like I'm actually making a difference in people's lives."

Sunrise Senior Living New Location: Thorne Mill on Steeles for Independent Living

For seniors who deserve a unique alternative to nursing homes, Sunrise Senior Living has offered the best care and comforts since 1981. Sunrise homes, over 420 throughout the world, are aging-in-place communities; staff are chosen and services designed to accommodate high functioning.

Thorne Mill on Steeles offers independent living for seniors who want to maintain a rich, rewarding life without running a household. It's ideal for an active senior who wants to focus on the things that matter most, but have assistance available at need.

To maintain seniors' independence and dignity in the lifestyle they're used to, Thorne Mill on Steeles begins by identifying each resident's individual needs. Residents don't just feel at home, they are at home. If you're looking at nursing homes and retirement communities for yourself or a loved one, explore the options and amenities at Thorne Mill on Steeles.

Independent living is the privacy and freedom of home, with the convenience and security of on-call assistance. This is what you're offered at Thorne Mill on Steeles. Here, one can age in place, with ready access to the different levels of care one might need up to and including end of life.

Active seniors have lifestyle choices. There's a full schedule of activities, including fitness and wellness programs; a selection of meal plans; and options for personalized services. For seniors who want partial support, assisted living options are available.

A prospective Thorne Mill on Steeles tenant might be 75 to 85 years old. He or she is active, able to enjoy shopping or such sports as golf; an involved grandparent, possibly even still with part-time business or professional interests, or working as a volunteer.

Thorne Mill on Steeles is a 12-storey building. The majority of its suites, 180, are dedicated to independent living, and 13 to assisted living. There are 26 Reminiscence suites for those with Alzheimer's, and 13 Terrace Club units for those in early phases of Alzheimer's or dementia.

At Thorne Mill on Steeles, each independent-living suite has a full kitchen with five appliances. There's a choice of floor plans, with one-bedroom, two-bedroom and studio suites; and some have a balcony or den.

The monthly rent covers two meals per day, weekly housekeeping and all daily activities. You can choose to have two meals daily in the fine dining room, or prepare your own meals in your kitchen. Dining room meals can also be used for your family and guests.

Every Thorne Mill on Steeles resident has access to the library and lounge areas; also to the pool, spa, sauna, hot tub and state-of-the-art exercise room. Also, there's a bistro and bar.

Thorne Mill on Steeles has a community bus, with outings organized for the residents. Also, there's a town car with a chauffeur. For those who drive, underground parking is included in the rent.

Thorne Mill on Steeles is located on Steeles Ave. West, halfway between Bathurst and Yonge, in Thornhill. This home has easy access to the best this area has to offer: culture, shopping, community centres and more are all right here. Whether you enjoy the order of a well-organized day, or living at your own tempo, you'll feel at home

Thorne Mill on Steeles is high-end, but very good value for what you pay. Come in and visit; take the tour, and discuss it. Director of sales and marketing is Jill Wetstein. Phone 647-222-5615; and visit the website at www.sunriseseniorliving.ca <http://www.sunriseseniorliving.ca/>

Catholic-Jewish dialogue finds home at Western

By LISA VARANO
Special to The CJN

The first Canadian centre to study the relationship between Jews and Catholics has been founded at the University of Western Ontario.

King's University College, an affiliate of Western, recently announced that its new Centre for Catholic-Jewish Learning will begin hosting events this academic year.

Andrea Rector

Rabbi Joel Wittstein, spiritual leader of Temple Israel of London and co-chair of the centre, said that one of the centre's goals is to better relations between the Jewish and Catholic communities.

Since it's an academic centre, it will also invite speakers to campus and conduct research, he said.

Rabbi Wittstein said his interest in interfaith dialogue goes back many years.

As a child, his best friend, who was Catholic, gave him a pamphlet encouraging Jews to convert to Catholicism.

"That, at a fairly young age, convinced me that there needed to be some work done," he said.

The relationship between Catholics and Jews has vastly improved since the Second Vatican Council called for change 40 years ago, Rabbi Wittstein said.

He added that the common ground between Judaism and Catholicism is a starting point for improving relations between the two groups.

Jews need to learn about the people they live among, Rabbi Wittstein said.

"We are a tiny minority in a much larger sea, and if we're going to live meaningfully and with understanding among larger groups, we have to know something about them," he said. "We need to reach out."

Andrea Rector, the Catholic student representative on the centre's board, said misunderstanding still exists between the Jewish and Catholic communities and needs to be corrected.

"People should be enriching one another's faith," she said.

The centre has already started to have a positive effect, she said.

"It's created discussion," she said. "Just the fact that it's there gets people thinking and talking."

Rector said that her experience with the centre has affected her personally.

"It's definitely made me more sensitive, not only to the language that I use when talking about faith – my own and other people's but also to the experience that someone has of their own faith and how it's no less valid than mine," she said.

Although Rector is Catholic, she said she was raised without a religion and was exposed to the Jewish community in the Thornhill neighbourhood where she grew up.

Her brother chose to become Jewish.

"We joke that every time we get together it's an interfaith dialogue," she said. "It's given me an intimate understanding of what it means for someone to be Jewish."

Rector said she hopes to use her interest in interfaith dialogue to mediate religious conflicts in the future.

The centre's first lecture will be held in February and will deal with how to promote meaningful dialogue between Catholics and Jews.

For more information on the centre, visit www.uwo.ca/kings/ccjl.

Maurie Sherman was born to work in radio

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's not often that a 28-year-old man can call himself a veteran in his professional field, but MIX 99.9-FM radio producer Maurie Sherman can.

Having worked in the radio broadcasting industry since 1996 – even before he graduated from Humber College's radio broadcasting program – Sherman has been employed by some of Toronto's highest profile radio stations, including CFRB, CHUM-FM, CHFI-FM, TALK 640, EZ Rock and, most recently, JACK-FM.

For the past three years, Sherman has felt at home as the morning-show producer and publicist for JACK-FM in Toronto, which is owned by Rogers Communications Inc.

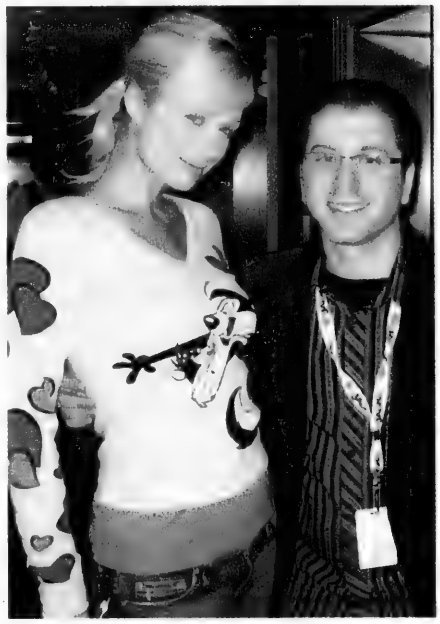
Although Sherman insisted he loved working for Rogers, he was just offered a job with Mad Dog and Billie, MIX 99.9-FM's morning-show duo, as senior morning-show producer, a position he accepted.

A typical day for Sherman starts before the crack of dawn. He crawls out of bed at 4 a.m., walks to the JACK-FM station, which is just down the street from where he lives at Bloor and Jarvis streets in Toronto, to make sure the show runs smoothly and on time.

Once he begins working for MIX 99.9 at the end of the month, he'll have to make his way over to the station at Yonge and St. Clair. But this won't be the only change in his morning routine.

"There is going to be so many new challenges there because they're very guest intensive," said Sherman, who anticipates that a big part of his job will be booking both local and celebrity guests more frequently.

But what separates him from other producers is that Sherman isn't completely content staying behind the scenes at all times.



Maurie Sherman with Paris Hilton

"I can't stress enough the passion that I have towards voice work," said Sherman, who does television voice work for G4TechTV, A-Channel in Ottawa and Barrie, and OMNI 1 and 2, as well as radio commercials for CHFI-FM, JACK-FM, FAN 590 and 680 News.

Sherman also recently started doing a weekly segment for JACK-FM in Vancouver called Tuesdays With Maurie, during which he dishes out the latest celebrity gossip and entertainment news.

Sherman is so passionate about radio that until recently, he worked seven days a week– weekdays at JACK-FM and weekends as the remotes co-ordinator at CHFI, where he set up live-on-location broadcasts.

He was even given the opportunity by CHFI radio host Erin Davis to branch out by acting as a kind of reporter of important local events.

"For things like Canadian Idol, or the [Toronto International] Film Festival, Erin Davis, who is my idol in this industry – I think she is the coolest person – she would put me on and interview me about my experiences."

He said that at the film festival, he wasn't there to do movie reviews, rather he played the role of paparazzi.

Sherman described a memorable encounter he had at a Toronto bar during the film festival with actor Liam Neeson, which he recorded on his blog.

"I asked if I could have a picture with him. He said sure. I said security would not allow me in the section with my camera…

"He told me: 'Don't worry – I'll go to where you are, and we can take the picture there.' With a smile on my face, I walked back to my friends and told them: 'Liam will come here to take the picture…'

Books impossible-to-get interviewees

"As I watched him walk out through the kitchen, the smile on my face got smaller, and the smile on the security guard got bigger."

But this disappointing experience with a movie star didn't discourage Sherman from making the jump to an occasional on-air celebrity interviewer.

"Allegedly, I am very good at doing interviews. I never prepare for them. I don't prepare questions. I just walk in as someone who doesn't know you… That's how I approach all my interviews."

He claims that he got exclusive information about actor Mark Wahlberg during an interview he conducted last summer.

"I was the only interviewer that ever asked him, 'Tell me one thing that nobody knows about Mark Wahlberg.' He said, 'The one thing nobody knows about me is that I have really bad gas.' And I thought, great, I'm the one that broke that."

He said that as an avid fan of the animated series Family Guy, he has interviewed almost every voice artist on the show, including Alex Borstein, who does the voice of Lois Griffin.

"She is very funny, she is very cool. We went on this whole angle for a while about Judaism," Sherman said.

Other celebrities Sherman has interviewed include Laura Weisberger, author of The Devil Wears Prada, musician Alice Cooper and talk-show host Joan Rivers.

Although Sherman has what it takes to do a one-on-one with some of the biggest celebs, perhaps his best talent is booking that impossible-to-get interview.

"I got the Canadian exclusive with Donald Trump live on the morning that the new season [of The Apprentice] started last year by faxing his assistant every day for a year.

"She phoned me yelling and said 'You got him.' We became somewhat friendly because she loved my push and desire for that. I am persistent to the point where I piss people off. You either piss publicists off or you get what you want and that is a chance you have to take."

Maurie Sherman with Alice Cooper

As passionate as Sherman is about his job, he said that family and Judaism is very important to him as well.

"I will always make time for my grandmother and make sure that on the High Holy Days I am at her place for dinner. Whenever I can, I go to Holy Blossom Temple," he said, adding that he had his bar mitzvah there and also served as the vice-president of the shul's youth program.

He said that sometimes being Jewish factors into the work that he does.

"On Rosh Hashanah, I brought in my shofar and I got to blow it on the air with [former JACK-FM radio host] Rob Christie… I have been on the air talking about the meaning of Purim, I've talked about the meaning of Rosh Hashanah, I've made latkes and brought them in," he said, joking about being the station's token Jew.

Regardless of what Sherman is doing in radio – whether he is producing, conducting interviews or blowing a shofar – broadcasting is the only thing he's ever wanted to do with his life.

"I knew from day one. I popped out of my mother with a microphone and said, 'Good morning, Toronto.' It is something I have always loved doing. My dad has tapes of me imitating Roger, Rick and Marilyn [morning-show hosts] from CHUM-FM before puberty. It's very embarrassing," he said with a laugh.

"I've never thought of anything else to do. If it wasn't radio, I would have no idea what else to do."

He said that the best part of his job is the feeling of accomplishment.

"It is very rewarding. With someone like Erin Davis, who constantly pats you on the back, it's just really rewarding and makes you want to get up at four in the morning."

Israel won't attack Iran, official says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israel will not launch a military strike against Iran to destroy its nuclear facilities and stop it from acquiring a nuclear bomb, says the director of the Syria and Lebanon division of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

"The answer is definitely no," Yigal Palmor said during a recent visit to Ottawa.

"This was our policy under [former prime minister Ariel] Sharon and it has not changed under [Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert. We believe that international sanctions is the possible answer."

Palmor, who also serves as spokesperson to the international francophone media outlets and was called upon during the recent Lebanon war to act as spokesperson to a variety of media, was in Ottawa on Nov. 6, and travelled to Montreal and Quebec City the following day. While in Ottawa, he met with members of Parliament's foreign affairs committee from all four parties.

The multilingual native of Jerusalem is the son of a diplomat and lived in Europe during his youth. After receiving his first degree from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Palmor followed his father into the foreign service.

While in Ottawa, Palmor met with faculty from Carleton University's Norman Paterson School of International Affairs, as well as officials from the Department of National Defence, representatives of the Department of Foreign Affairs, and members of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Palmor said he found the Canadians he met with to be very "polite" in their questioning.

"To be quite frank, nobody really gave me a hard time in the sense of pushing hard on sensitive issues," he said. "People have opinions and they have their views, but I really felt that people were interested in an exchange of views and opinions… there was a very wide-ranging exchange – a discussion, but never a dispute."

The topic of greatest interest was Lebanon, he said.

"Lebanon was the hot spot, fresh in people's memories," Palmor said.

There was also concern about the threat of Iran's influence in the Middle East. "Iran is clearly perceived as seeking not only nuclear capacity, but also domination over the whole Middle East… they are frightening not only to Israel, but also to moderate Arab countries," he said.

"There seems to be an alliance being formed by moderate Arab countries… there is an objective common interest here to practically all moderate countries in the Middle East to stop Iran while it is feasible, and this is probably what will be on the top of the agenda for the coming years."

NCSY to honour Tory MP

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The National Conference on Synagogue Youth (NCSY) took a shine to Tory MP Jason Kenney.

According to Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director for NCSY Canada, it all started this past summer during the Israel-Hezbollah conflict.

"When the world took aim at Israel and its retaliatory strategy, [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper and his caucus took a very principled, decent and honourable stance with Israel's democracy," said Rabbi Black.

When former Liberal MP Borys Wrzesnewskyj called for Canada to be more open in talks with Hezbollah this past August, Kenney was quick to respond.

At a press conference on Aug. 22, Kenney, the MP from Calgary Southeast and Harper's parliamentary secretary, said of the Liberals, "Their idea of a balanced approach is one where Israel is always wrong."

He likened Hezbollah to the 1930s Nazi party and defended Israel's policies during the Hezbollah conflict as "a measured response," while others accused Israel of disproportionate attacks on the terrorist group's southern Lebanon positions.

"[He] is a very good friend to the Jewish community," said Rabbi Black. "He is open about the principled stance that [the Conservative party] took."

On Nov. 19, NCSY Canada honours Kenney with its National Leadership Award at its annual fundraising gala dinner at the Toronto Centre For The Arts.

"We wanted to send a message to the Conservative government and say, 'Thank you for seeing through the darkness,'" said Rabbi Black. "We chose Kenney because he's been an outspoken proponent of good and morality."

Kenney is scheduled to address some 300 people attending the $1,800-per-couple, private dinner at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, and again at an after-dinner concert in front of an expected 1,700-strong crowd.

Harper is expected to send greetings and remarks via video.

Now in its fifth year as a combined dinner and concert, the gala is one of the the non-profit's most critical events, accounting for nearly 30 per cent of NCSY's operating costs.

"It's a very significant chunk. Without it, I'm not sure what we would do," said Rabbi Black.

The NCSY, the youth division of the Orthodox Union, has been struggling to gain credibility in the Jewish community and Rabbi Black views the gala as a perfect marketing vehicle.

"We realized that the organization had to become more prominent in the community," he said. "We want to show them that NCSY is a serious outreach organization… stemming the tide of assimilation and intermarriage, and we believe that focusing on our youth is going to change this community for generations."

The gala dinner begins at 5:30 p.m. A post-dinner concert starts at 8 p.m. and will feature performances by Avraham Fried, Ohad and the Nafshenu Orchestra.

Beit Hanoun coverage lacked context, balance

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

By all accounts, the Internet is becoming the primary vehicle of news for young adults 18 to 34 years old. Based solely on a survey of internationally compiled Internet news sources, the Nov. 8 tragedy in Beit Hanoun, in which 19 Palestinian family members were accidentally killed by Israeli forces, managed to overshadow (in terms of the sheer number of stories) even the victory of the Democratic party in the United States' mid-term elections and the subsequent resignation of U.S. Secretary of State Donald Rumsfeld.

The death of innocent civilians is a terrible tragedy, and it was acknowledged as such by Israeli leaders, who immediately ordered an investigation. But the sheer weight of media attention devoted to it, as compared to the arguably far more significant political developments in the United States, raises important questions about international media priorities and proportionality.

A search engine such as Google News, which compiles reports from more than 4,500 English-language news sources worldwide and arranges them "to present the most relevant news first" gives us a valuable glimpse into what preoccupies the international media. For example, as of 4 p.m. on Nov. 8, Google News returned more than 2,100 hits on the Israel-Gaza story, while the Rumsfeld resignation returned just under 700.

To be sure, mainstream Western media outlets, including the major North American evening newscasts on Nov. 8, gave top billing to the U.S. elections. Still, the Gaza story wasn't far behind.

On BBC World (seen on the CBC's Newsworld) Matthew Price, reporting from Beit Hanoun, showed scene after scene of injured Palestinian children, weeping parents and ruined apartments, while emphasizing that "the big question really has to be why did Israel send so many artillery shells into an area that quite clearly was full of civilians?"

Price did note: "Israel has expressed regret, but it says the army is trying to stop Palestinian rocket fire towards Israel." His report included an interview with Israeli spokesperson Miri Eisen, who said: "It was an unintentional tragedy today, and we will try to understand and make sure it doesn't happen again. But we ask, where is the accountability on the Palestinian side? Who is asking questions there about the day-to-day rocket fire into the state of Israel?"

Eisen raised the broader, contextual questions, but Price did not elaborate. Rather, returning to an image of grieving Palestinians, he said: "But here and around the world, the questions are once again about Israel's actions, about what's acceptable force and about how so many [Palestinians] could have been killed in their beds."

Price's report highlights the problem that Israel so frequently faces. Repeated provocation, such as Palestinians firing hundreds of rockets from Gaza into Israel population centres, receives scant media attention and little international criticism of the perpetrators of the attacks. However, an errant military response from Israel that regrettably causes civilian casualties receives massive media attention and international condemnation – which is made all the more compelling because of the large number of journalists on the scene who are able to capture sensational images.

The BBC at least interviewed an Israeli who could explain the country's viewpoint, but on both CBC's The National and CTV's National News, Israel's position was referred to only briefly and indirectly.

On the CBC, Peter Armstrong reported: "Israeli officials have expressed regret for the shelling, which they said was supposed to hit a rocket-launching site half a kilometre away." He added: "Beit Hanoun is after all, a major centre for rocket attacks into southern Israel."

CTV's Janice Mackay Frayer paid even less attention to Israel's case, focusing instead almost entirely on the human toll in Beit Hanoun.

Nonetheless, it must be noted that in their previous reports from Gaza about the Nov. 3 stand-off at the mosque in Beit Hanoun, both Frayer and Armstrong focused substantially on the nature of the provocations by the Hamas-backed Palestinian militants, including their use of women as human shields.

Ideally, however, journalists should provide full context in each and every report, in order to ensure that viewers and readers have sufficient information to fairly draw their own conclusions.

Hillel House attacked in B.C.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

Eyal Lichtmann, executive director of Vancouver Hillel, looks through the smashed windows of his office last week.

VANCOUVER — Jewish students and the staff of the Vancouver Hillel Foundation on the campus of the University of British Columbia were shocked to find that vandals had smashed the front windows of Hillel House in the early hours of Monday Nov. 6.

"Two boulders the size of a football and a large grapefruit came through the front windows of the office of Hillel's executive director, Eyal Lichtmann," said Pat Johnson, director of development and communications for Vancouver Hillel.

"It was very upsetting and disconcerting to our students and staff, but we're getting wonderful messages of support from friends and strangers in our community."

The vandalism coincided with the commemoration of Kristallnacht in Vancouver, and with the start of Holocaust Awareness Week at UBC, during which a display in the Student Union Building educated students, faculty and passers-by about the history and meaning of the Holocaust.

"There's no way to tell if this is connected with Holocaust Awareness Week, but we're well aware of the irony of it," Johnson said.

Lichtmann speculated that the vandalism was related to publicity surrounding a scheduled Dec. 3 talk at UBC by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak.

This is the third year in a row that Vancouver Hillel has been targeted by anti-Semitic vandalism. One year ago, when the ambassadors of Jordan and Israel were on campus discussing peace, the side windows of Hillel House were smashed.

Two years ago, a hand-carved sign in front of Hillel House was ripped from the ground and destroyed, causing thousands of dollars of damage.

"That occurred the day after we publicly announced the student government's sponsorship of [academic and Israel critic] Noam Chomsky on campus," Lichtmann said.

"There seems to be a constant theme of attempts to silence our students from the wonderful Israeli advocacy programs that they're conducting on campus," he said.

"This was a definite act of intimidation, it wasn't a random act of violence. As the only Jewish organization on campus, we're very concerned that we're targeted, but Canadians at large should be concerned too, because this is not just a Jewish issue. I would label it a hate crime, and it's unacceptable in Canadian society."

Senate bill would make suicide bombing a crime

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

After being stalled in the Senate for two years, a bill that would criminalize suicide bombings has passed second reading and has been referred to committee for study.

Bill S-206 would amend the Criminal Code by including suicide bombing as part of the definition of terrorism. It will likely come before the Senate committee early in the new year.

Senator Jerry Grafstein, the bill's sponsor, said the proposal is "a made-in-Canada solution" that will clarify domestic criminal law.

"Those who would incite, promote or advocate suicide bombing would be culpable," he said. "I want to make this type of invidious conduct, that falls below civilized standards" a criminal offence.

The bill, which is only one sentence long, states simply that "for greater certainty, a suicide bombing comes within… the definition – terrorist activity."

Grafstein said the law would apply to people within Canada who plot or promote suicide attacks.

In a Senate debate when he moved second reading of the bill, Grafstein stated that "a specific prohibition against 'suicide bombing' would directly assist and enhance the prosecutions of those unsuccessful 'suicide bombers' and of those who individually and collectively conspire to assist in 'suicide bombings.' Peace, order and good government lies at the base of Canada's system of rule of law. Suicide bombing is contrary to the heart of the national principles of constitutional governance.

"Our criminal law as is stands does not expressly prohibit those who intentionally choose to lose their own lives as a means of taking as many other civilian lives as possible. If suicide bombing is tantamount to homicide, the Criminal Code should eliminate any doubt about it as a clear-cut, express criminal offence," he said.

Grafstein said the bill had been held up by the previous Paul Martin government on the basis that murder was already in the Criminal Code and thus the bill would be extraneous. However, with the change in government, Liberal Senators joined the other parties to unanimously support the bill on second reading.

Grafstein said he was confident that once it passes the Senate, a number of MPs would be prepared to introduce it in the House of Commons.

The bill drew support from Canadians Against Suicide Bombing (CANASB), a non-profit organization that has lobbied to make suicide bombing a crime against humanity.

Reuben Bromstein, a retired judge who is CANASB's president, said that even if suicide bombing is implicitly covered by the Criminal Code, "why not make it explicit? We might as well do it and be an example to the rest of the world… Others might follow Canada's lead."

Bromstein said CANASB opposes suicide bombings regardless of where they take place. "In essence, there is a phenomenon around the world. We don't focus on your objective, it is the means we object to and hopefully everybody can agree on that."

A petition on CANASB's website (www.canasb.ca) calls on the federal government to amend the Criminal Code to explicitly designate suicide bombing as a terrorist act and "to lead the world to say suicide bombing is a crime against humanity and prosecute its organizers."

CANASB would like to see Canada lead a campaign at the United Nations to amend international laws to specifically make suicide bombings against civilians a crime against humanity and to encourage other countries to prosecute people who organize the attacks.

On the international front, the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles has spearheaded a push to include suicide bombing as a crime against humanity. As well, Australia's parliament has passed a bipartisan motion adopting that position, and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), a 55-member international security organization, passed a non-binding resolution in July 2005 that urged member states to recognize "that suicide attacks of the terrorist nature constitute 'crimes against humanity.'"

Correction

The story "Canadian Jews signed up for armed forces in large numbers" (CJN, Nov. 9), incorrectly stated that pilot Harry Sklar did not earn a commission. In fact, he was commissioned as a flying officer.

Feds considering security assistance

fundraising and allocation arm, said $550,000 was spent in the 2005-06 fiscal year on security measures at the Lipa Green Building, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, the Wolfond Centre and at Jewish schools. That figure does not include the cost of security guards at schools, synagogues or agencies at other locations.

Over the next three years, federation is forecasting total security costs of $11 million to $12 million, which includes about $550,000 in annual costs as well as capital expenditures on security measures at the planned Lebovic Jewish Community Campus and the Central Square development (to be located on the site of the current BJCC).

English said the capital costs attributable to infrastructure security measures include surveillance systems and built-in security areas, but he did not provide details.

Since 9/11, community representatives have raised community security concerns in virtually all meetings with politicians, Farber said.

"The previous government listened but did not come out with any statement of action… I'm optimistic that the minister of public security is both now talking the talk and is preparing to walk the walk."

Leclerc's comments came after a reporter from CanWest News followed up a letter by Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel that called on the federal government to consider a fund to offset costs of security for at-risk communities.

"We are thrilled that Mr. Day and Prime Minister Stephen Harper are considering our proposal," said MP Anita Neville, co-chair of the parliamentary group. "The reality is that certain religious and ethnic groups are more likely to be targeted by terrorists than other groups, and as a result, they have to implement extra security measures.

"Whether it is at churches, mosques, synagogues, gurdwaras [Sikh places of worship] or community centres, extra security is often needed. We urge the government to take action on this, and we're pleased they seem to be taking this issue seriously," Neville stated.

Farber noted that security concerns of communities have changed with the times. "In the 21st century, there are at-risk communities. While the number of acts may not go up or remain the same, it's the kind of act perpetrated against us that has changed," he said. "In the last 2½ years, two Jewish day schools in Montreal have been firebombed."

In addition, since 2002, a period roughly corresponding to the onset of the Palestinian intifadah, synagogues in Edmonton, Saskatoon, Toronto and Quebec City have been struck by arson.

The U.S. government already operates a $25-million (US) program to assist at-risk non-profit groups. Jewish groups in 18 communities received $14 million of that amount in 2005, with no one institution receiving more than $100,000. New York's Jewish community received the largest amount, getting about $4.5 million of $6.3 million allocated to non-profits in the city, JTA reported.

Eva Wiseman to launch book at Winnipeg book fair

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the completion of Kanada, her fourth novel, Eva Wiseman has finished her history of the Holocaust in Hungary and its far-reaching effects on Hungarian Jewry.

Although her new novel's official launch is not until Nov. 30 at McNally Robinson Booksellers here, Wiseman is previewing the book at the annual Winnipeg Jewish Book Fair at the Rady Jewish Community Centre on Nov. 20.

The Winnipeg-based Wiseman is one of several high-profile authors – both local and national – who are scheduled to appear at the Book Fair, Nov. 19 to 26. Among them are local writers Carol Matas, the internationally acclaimed author of over 30 novels for children and young adults, and Carol Rose, who has been widely published in anthologies and literary journals.

Out-of-towners include Toronto writer and storyteller Aubrey Davis, author of the award-winning Bagels from Benny; Edeet Ravel, the author of the critically acclaimed Ten Thousand Lovers and Look for Me (her newest work, A Wall of Light – the story of three generations of a Tel Aviv family – was a finalist for the Giller Prize); poet Susan Glickman who is receiving rave reviews for her first novel, The Violin Lover, a moving wartime story, set in London, that evokes the sensations of performing and listening to music; Ben Baader, whose book, Gender, Judaism, and Bourgeois Culture in Germany, 1800-1870, explores the process of modernization of Jewish religious culture and shows how rabbis and Jewish preachers encouraged their congregants to cultivate a Judaism shaped by feminine values; Ellen Jaffe, a Hamilton-based writer whose Feast of Lights is a celebration of Chanukah through the eyes of a 12-year-old; Melanie Fogell, whose first book, Ambiguous Selves: New Jewish Identities chronicles the author's search for identity as a Canadian Jewish woman and looks at the problems of Jewish identity faced by Israeli immigrant women when they move to Canada; and Ryerson English professor Ruth Panofsky, who will be speaking about her biography of noted Canadian Jewish writer and former Winnipegger Adele Wiseman.

The daughter of Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivors, Eva Wiseman (no relation to Adele Wiseman) spent her early years in Hungary. The family came to Canada after the Hungarian revolution in 1956.

Through her four novels, A Place Not Home, My Canary Yellow Star, No One Must Know and, most recently, Kanada, Wiseman has given voice to the Hungarian Jewish experience in the mid-20th century.

"I decided to write about the Holocaust from a Hungarian Jewish perspective," she explains, "because there have not been many books about the Hungarian Jewish experience in the Holocaust. Most reflect the Polish Jewish experience."

Her first book, A Place Not Home, is Wiseman's own story. The novel, which was released in 1996, is the story of a 13-year-old Jewish girl growing up in Communist Hungary whose family decides to flee to freedom during the Hungarian Revolution.

The novel became a bestseller. It is still being taught in schools throughout North America and has been published in France.

Wiseman's second novel, My Canary Yellow Star, came out in 2001 and won several awards, including a listing on the New York Public Library's teen book list. The novel is also about a teenage Jewish girl living in Hungary, this time during World War II. Her family is among those saved by Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg.

Having written about Hungarian Jewry during the Holocaust and under Communism, for her third novel, Wiseman focused on the Hungarian Jewish immigrants' adaptation to life in Canada in the late 1950s and early 1960s.

Her third novel, No One Must Know, was released in November 2005. It is set in Winnipeg in the late 1950s among the Hungarian Jews who settled here after the war or the 1956 uprising.

The theme Wiseman tackles in this novel is the phenomenon of denial of their Jewish identity by some of the Jewish newcomers. The main character is a teenage Hungarian Jewish girl named Alex who doesn't know she is Jewish. Her parents are pretending to be Catholic.

The author recalls that within her parents' social circle were a number of Hungarian Jewish families who denied their Jewishness without ever actually converting to Christianity.

"I would overhear my parents talking about friends who were pretending to be Christian and even joined churches [generally the Catholic Church], although they never converted," she says. "In some cases, the children didn't know they were Jewish. In other families, the children were told they were Jewish but warned about revealing that secret to anybody."

Kanada is a prequel to No One Must Know. The main character is a young Hungarian Jewish woman in Auschwitz who makes an appearance in the earlier book as a childhood friend of Alex's mother. The mother also appears in the new novel.

To research the new book, Wiseman visited Poland and Auschwitz and interviewed many survivors. She also spoke a lot with her 94-year-old father who moved in with her a couple of years ago. He was imprisoned in Auschwitz from July 1944 until he was liberated in May 1945.

Having finished Kanada, Wiseman feels she has done full justice to the story of the Holocaust and Hungarian Jewry. For her next novel, she is going back to the 19th century. All she will say about the new novel, due out in 2008, is that it will focus on a Jewish teenager and that it is a unique story.

Conference addresses dialogue

he said. "I think that is something primarily unique to Modern Orthodoxy, and I do mourn the fact that it has disappeared." He added, however, that he thinks it is something that can re-emerge."

Panel moderator Elliott Malamet noted that it "seems one grows not by talking to people who agree with you, but with people who don't. That's how ideas get sharpened."

He also questioned whether Modern Orthodox Jews have the right to complain about "infiltration, or whatever word you want to use, of elements from the right" when Modern Orthodox institutions have hired haredi educators, "many of whom are extremely idealistic."

Heilman refers to haredi educators in Modern Orthodox schools as "agents provocateurs" – a controversial term he said he did not mean in a negative sense. "They...don't share the same values as many of the parents," he said. "They don't necessarily believe college education is an important value or that to be in both [Orthodox and secular] worlds is important.."

Heilman said that while Modern Orthodoxy values Jewish education and educators, "it's also not prepared to donate its own children to that task."

Also, noted Rabbi Student later in the program, the "cream of the crop of Modern Orthodox rabbis have been moving to Israel."

Ferziger, who made aliyah in 1987, said Israel can be "a source for a tremendous amount of power, energy and renaissance," but he cautioned parents to "take a serious interest in where they're sending their children."

Dawson victim expected to make full recovery

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Leslie Markofsky appears to be well on his way to a full recovery, almost two months after being shot twice in the head by Kimveer Gill during his Sept. 13 rampage at Dawson College.

A prize-winning business student at Concordia University's John Molson School of Business, Markofsky, 23, was the first and most seriously injured of the 20 people who were hurt that day, and he was the last to be released from hospital.

One Dawson student, Anastasia DeSousa, 18, was killed. But Markofsky, who was among 11 Dawson victims treated at the Montreal University Health Centre (MUHC)'s Montreal General Hospital, emerged from a coma and is expected to regain virtually all his abilities after rehabilitation.

Fragments of one bullet were removed, but doctors left the other one in his head.

Ida Markofsky, his mother, declined to speak to reporters, other than granting an exclusive interview to the CBC on Nov. 3.

But contacted by The CJN, she did say the family would speak to other media outlets at "some point" in the future.

In a brief answer to a question, she said that her son began to emerge from a coma about two weeks after his injury.

The timing seemed at odds with news reports that suggested Markofsky suddenly snapped out of his condition (his mother described that as the media "tweaking adjectives"). Other news reports said Markofsky had been put into an "induced" coma by doctors in order to allow his brain to rest and heal itself.

The National Post reported that to reduce massive swelling in Markofsky's brain, doctors performed a risky procedure called "osmolar therapy." The therapy, involving the administration of specific drugs, is usually used on children as a last-resort treatment to relieve intercranial pressure when conventional means have failed.

Whatever the case, during the television interview with him and his mother, Markofsky, wearing a special protective helmet prior to undergoing surgery to replace bone fragments in his skull, was articulate and grateful for a recovery that his family described as a "miracle."

Markofsky's plight was reported around the world, and the family received thousands of messages of prayer and good wishes.

They came "from people I never met, names I never heard of," Markofsky told the CBC. "Whatever people have been doing from the kindness of their hearts, it's been working. So I can only say thank you and wish I could return the favour in some way."

He recalled how on the day of the shooting, he ate breakfast with friends at Dawson, which he graduated from in 2005, and was standing in front of the school waiting to be picked up by car when he was hit.

Markofsky said he was "in the wrong place at the wrong time.

"You know, this is only something that happens to people on the news, not to me," he said.

"I don't know the person who did this. I don't know anything about him. I can't draw any conclusions about it. It's just a shame some people do the things they do."

His mother was less forgiving, saying the gunman's name doesn't warrant mention.

Markofsky said that when he awoke from his coma, he saw his best friend Matt standing over him.

"I didn't realize what was happening. I knew where I was, but didn't know why I saw my best friend here. I saw my parents here. So we must be all right on some level."

Rabbi Ronnie Cahana, spiritual leader of Beth-El Congregation, where the Markofskys are members, visited the immediate family – which includes father Jeffrey and sister Lauren – regularly in the hospital.

Another rabbi, Mordecai Zeitz of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux, encouraged people worldwide to send e-mails to the family.

Friends and colleagues described Markofsky as an extremely intelligent, friendly man, and a skilled golfer.

"I always knew he would come out [of the coma]," Rabbi Cahana told The CJN. "The truth is that God saved his life. I'm just a rabbi who tried not to be intrusive."

On Nov. 3, MUHC issued a statement announcing Markofsky's release, saying he was making an "excellent recovery."

In the statement, Ida Markofsky expressed deep gratitude to the MUHC and for the community's support over the last months.

"Our children are home," she said.

'Our bond is built on shared history' Livni tells GA

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

LOS ANGELES — After thanking the North American Jewish community for its continued support for the State of Israel, Israeli Foreign Affairs Minister Tzipi Livni assured about 4,000 delegates that despite the obstacles ahead, Israel and the Jewish people will persevere.

Livni was the keynote speaker at Sunday's opening plenary of the 75th United Jewish Community's General Assembly, an annual meeting of Jewish leaders from across the continent that was being held this year in Los Angeles.

The theme of this year's GA, which was originally called "Be with the Stars," was switched to "One People, One Destiny," to reflect Israel's need for support from the Diaspora since the recent Israel-Hezbollah war.

The four-day conference also featured addresses from influential Israeli and North American figures such as former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Canadian MP Irwin Cotler and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who was scheduled to speak on Tuesday in his first address to the North American Jewish community since the start of the war this past July.

The opening plenary featured musical performances, video montages and speeches from Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa; Galia Maor, GA Israel chair and CEO of Bank Leumi; Jewish Agency chairman Ze'ev Bielski; Karnit Goldwasser, wife of kidnapped soldier Ehud Goldwasser; and actors Jeff Goldblum and Jon Voigt, among others.

Before Livni took to the stage, Dan Gordon, a Hollywood screenwriter who served as an Israel Defence Forces spokesperson during last summer's war, spoke about a new kind of terrorism that is threatening Israel.

"When Hezbollah launched their unprovoked attack against Israel on July 12, killing eight Israeli soldiers and kidnapping Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, and launching what would come to be more than 4,000 rocket attacks, it was clear that we were witnessing an evolution in terrorism," Gordon said.

"Hezbollah is not just a terrorist organization. It is a terrorist army. It is financed like an army, looks like an army, is trained like an army and is organized like an army, and yet its strategy is to inflict mass civilian casualties amongst Israel's population.

"But unlike our parents' generation, we live in a time where those who target Jews are answerable to a Jewish army. They are answerable to the Jewish state and they are answerable to all of us in this room," Gordon added.

Livni, who was received by a standing ovation, talked about the common goals of the Jewish people both in Israel and abroad, and she said that although the relationship between Israeli and Diaspora Jews is defined in terms of "common dangers," the bond shared goes beyond that.

"Our bond is built on shared history and shared faith, on a rich tapestry of tradition and culture, and on a responsibility not only to protect our Jewish identity but to make it flourish for generations to come," Livni said.

She also addressed the threat of Iran as a nuclear power to both Israel and the rest of the world.

"Iran's intentions are not only a direct threat to Israel, but they are also a threat to the values that the international community as a whole holds dear."

She also blamed Israel's recent war with Hezbollah on Iran and acknowledged the new challenges Israel faces when fighting a terrorist army.

"Though the war took place in Lebanon, it was the case of the rogue state, Iran, and its proxy, Hezbollah, abusing a weak state, Lebanon. For Israel, the war revealed significant shortcomings that we must correct, but it also created opportunities that we can build upon."

Livni also made reference to the three missing soldiers who were kidnapped by Hezbollah months ago.

"Our soldiers, our sons, captured by Hezbollah, Ehud Goldwasser, Eldad Regev and Gilad Shalit, still remain in captivity. Those who keep them there see our desire to do everything, but everything, to bring them home as a sign of weakness. They are wrong. This is testimony to our strength," she said.

"Your voice is important and I urge you to speak out on their behalf and make sure that this remains on the international agenda and conscience. We will not rest until our boys are freed."

Although Livni made it clear that the Israeli government is dedicated to achieving peace in the Middle East, she acknowledged that peace will be impossible until groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah acknowledge Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state.

"No peace process in history has succeeded without each side recognizing the legitimacy of the other."

She said that she envisions an Israeli and Palestinian state existing side by side in peace. But, she said, "there is no place in this vision for terrorism. Each people should be willing to keep up part of their agreement to make room for the dreams of the others."

She added that to ensure the security of Israel, it may be necessary to give up parts of Israel.

Speaking after Livni's address, Ted Sokolsky, the president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said that although last summer's war was tragic, it helped bring together Jewish communities around the world.

"I think one of the great things, one of the great outcomes of this war with Lebanon, for all the wrong reasons, is that the Diaspora Jewry and Israeli Jewry have come together and there is a mutual respect," he said.

"Now the GA is becoming more relevant and more important… I'm glad to see that the attendance is up, people are involved and people are more engaged in the issues that affect the Jewish community."

Warrant issued for former Iranian president

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — An Argentine judge ordered the arrest of Iran's former president in the 1994 AMIA Jewish centre bombing in Buenos Aires.

President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani was one of seven former Iranian government officials and one Hezbollah operative named as accomplices in the attack, which killed 85 people and wounded more than 300.

Judge Rodolfo Canicoba-Corral issued warrants for their arrests and declared the bombing a crime against humanity, which means the case has no statute of limitations. Israeli Ambassador Rafael Eldad called the development "highly significant."

Stolen Klimt sets record

JTA

NEW YORK — A Klimt painting stolen by the Nazis and returned to its rightful owner set records at auction last week.

Austria ended an extensive legal battle in January by handing over five works by Gustav Klimt to Maria Altmann, the niece of Adele and Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer. One of the paintings was a portrait of Adele. It sold for $87.9 million (US) at a Christie's auction in New York last week, setting a record for a Klimt. It had been expected to sell for $40 million to $60 million.

"My Aunt Adele and Uncle Ferdinand enjoyed living with these paintings and sharing them, and we trust that their new owners will build on this tradition of appreciation," Altmann said.

Three of the other Klimts also sold for much more than anticipated. Another work reclaimed through Nazi restitution, by Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, sold for $38 million, above its estimated value of $18 million to $25 million.

Shaarei Shomayim of Toronto seeks a Baal Tefilah/Chazzan

The Shaarei Shomayim congregation of Toronto is seeking to hire a full time Baal Tefilah/Chazzan.

The Baal Tefilah/Chazzan is a member of the clergy team, performing all duties and leadership responsibilities in a professional and personable manner consistent with the modern orthodox values of Shaarei Shomayim.

The responsibilities of the Baal Tefilah/Chazzan include leading the davening, working with our Rabbi in performing life cycle services, and, participating in the design and teaching of education courses.

The successful candidate will set a personal tone which is warm, inviting and thoughtful. The Baal Tefilah/Chazzan should establish an atmosphere for davening which is participative, respectful and spiritual.

Candidates should have at least five years of experience as a Baal Tefilah/Chazzan.

'The natural choice to win this award'

says Brady, a plumber in Toronto for more than 40 years. "Not just these awards, but this whole story – it's like a dream."

The award is the culmination of a story that began when Hana was murdered. The only thing the little girl left behind was a suitcase, on which was written her name, her birth date and the German word waisenkind, which means orphan.

The mysterious suitcase found its way into the hands of Japanese school teacher Fumiko Ishioka, co-ordinator of the now-defunct Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Center. Ishioka, who had written letters to several Holocaust museums around the world requesting children's artifacts for her modest collection at the centre, received the suitcase, along with a baby shoe, a little sock, a baby sweater and a can of Zyklon B gas, from the Auschwitz Museum in Poland in March 2000.

"Although there is a Holocaust museum in Hiroshima, Holocaust education is a very new subject in Japan. In the history textbooks, the Holocaust is only described in a few lines. As a result, most students in Japan have never even heard the word 'Holocaust' before," says Ishioka, who estimates that since the centre in Tokyo closed three years ago, she has been able to bring a travelling exhibit about the Holocaust to more than 200 schools in Japan, reaching some 60,000 students.

"There are some teachers who have started to realize that there are many important universal lessons to be learned from the Holocaust. But we still have a long way to go," she says.

When the centre was still open, Ishioka says several students who visited were curious to know more about the mysterious Hana Brady.

"I remember one girl from high school was furious that the Nazis had classified her as an 'orphan,'" Ishioka recalls. "I realized I needed to know more about this little girl. In order to really tell the story of the Holocaust, I had to put a face to the suitcase."

Thus began Ishioka's journey. A trip to the Czech Republic led to Poland and finally, in September 2000, to George Brady in Toronto. Ishioka wrote him a letter, to which he responded immediately, with photos of Hana and himself as children. Ishioka says: "I finally got to see the face I had so long been looking for."

"When Fumiko first contacted me, it was totally unexpected. If the letter had come from Europe, it somehow would have been easier to explain than from Japan, which seemed like this faraway country that had nothing to do with me or this history," Brady says. "It was lucky for me that she was so persistent."

Ishioka recalls Brady's response to her request for information about Hana. "I cannot thank George enough for his courage to share such difficult memories with me," she says. "I will never forget what he first said to me: 'if it's for children, then I will share.'"

Ishioka and Brady first met in person in Toronto in January 2001. Their meeting inspired CBC journalist Karen Levine to create a prize-winning radio documentary – and to write her first book.

Since it was first published in English in April 2002, Hana's Suitcase has been translated into more than 20 languages (Ishioka herself did the Japanese translation), and published in more than 27 countries. "This is the most exciting thing for me, that this story is being so widely read by so many children from so many different backgrounds," Ishioka says.

When the book was translated into Hebrew – by Schocken Publishing House in Israel – it became eligible for the Yad Vashem award.

"Hana's Suitcase was the natural choice to win this award," says Haim Gertner, director of teacher training at the International School for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem.

"One of the main pillars of the school's educational philosophy is that when you are teaching about the Holocaust, you have to focus on one individual. You have to save the soul of one person among the pile of bodies. You have to see a face, and be involved with a particular person's story," he says.

"Not only does Hana's Suitcase focus on one face, but it follows the process by which one educator came to discover that face. The story is unbelievable. It's interesting and it's touching, and it's very important.

"Now that the generation of the survivors is disappearing, we have to give tools to the next generation. This book is an important educational tool that really presents the Holocaust in a touching and sensitive way," Gertner says

Hana's Suitcase has already expanded to encompass other mediums. A production of Hana's Suitcase was staged in Toronto, at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People, this fall, and the show is set to tour Canada, the United States and perhaps even to England. Documentary filmmakers in the Czech Republic are about to start working on a film about the story.

"It's neat to get acknowledgement – especially so far from home," says Lara Hana, who just completed her undergraduate degree in anthropology and Near and Middle Eastern civilizations at the University of Toronto. "It's exciting, but it's bizarre. It's completely taken over our lives. We have had to put everything else on hold."

She adds that since the book launch they have struggled to respond to hundreds of letters, e-mails and invitations they have received from around the world. Over the last few years, they have visited many places in Europe, Japan, the United States, Canada and central America.

On Nov. 14, the father-and-daughter pair returned to Israel to attend a ceremony to dedicate a memorial plaque to Hana at the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot, of which Brady has been a longtime board member.

"I feel that what we are doing now is really important," says Lara Hana. "In a way it's gone way beyond Hana, and is really opening up doors – especially for kids who don't know anything about the Holocaust, since Hana is someone who everyone can identify with."

Brady adds: "It's very gratifying that my sister's story has been turned into this huge international educational tool. There is no consolation for her loss, but it's the best thing that one could imagine – that out of something so bad could come something so good.

"I can't help but think that all of this has somehow been directed by some higher being – that my little sister, the girl who dreamt of becoming a small-town teacher, is now teaching thousands of kids around the world."

Aside from the award for Children's Holocaust Literature, donated by the Bruno Brandt Foundation, Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies gave out prizes for the outstanding Holocaust education programs to the Mevo'ot Primary School in Be'er Tuvia, the Manor Kabri Middle School at Kibbutz Eilon, and the Rabin School in Givat Ze'ev. English teacher Marsha Goren, of the Ein-Ganim Primary School in Petach Tikvah, received an award for the most outstanding educator. Chana Kupetz, Talia Kirsh and Elior Cohen received awards for writing outstanding high school matriculation papers dealing with issues related to the Holocaust.

New IDF infantry brigade

Eyeing Syria, the IDF has formed a new infantry brigade, known as Kfir ("young lion") as a counter-measure to Syria's commando forces, which are considered to be better than Hezbollah guerrillas, an Israeli military source told the Times.

The IDF is also reportedly integrating three elite brigades in preparation for them co-operating on deep cross-border operations into Syria and Iran.

Also, shortly before the Lebanon war, Maj.-Gen. Eliezer Shkedy was appointed head of the IDF's Iranian Front, and as such will command any future strikes against Syria or Iran.

Some analysts say it would have been better for Israel to attack Syria during the recent war with Hezbollah. Syria has consistently supplied Hezbollah with weapons and, according to recent UN reports, has continued to smuggle arms to the group despite an international embargo.

"If they had acted against Syria during this last kerfuffle, the war might have ended more quickly, and better," said American analyst Richard Perle.

"Syrian military installations are sitting ducks and the Syrian air force could have been destroyed on the ground in a couple of days," Perle continued.

European anti-Semitism increases

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — Israel's recent war with Hezbollah led to a new wave of anti-Semitic incidents in Europe, almost all of them in western Europe, a new report finds.

The European Jewish Congress' 53-page report, presented Sunday at a World Jewish Congress meeting in Paris, reveals that the transference of anti-Israel sentiment onto Jews occurred almost exclusively in western Europe, with the atmosphere remaining either neutral or pro-Israel in the former eastern bloc.

Denmark was another exception, the EJC notes, saying that media and politicians there kept a balanced view of the conflict.

The conclusion that anti-Semitism rose worldwide during that war is already well documented, but the EJC report points to specific trends that pose challenges in Europe, such as the collaboration of Muslim extremists with left-wing political parties; political and media comparisons of Israeli leaders to Nazis; and the first instances of Turkish Jews complaining of anti-Semitism since an Islamic-based political party took power in Turkey in 2002.

The Paris-based EJC hopes to use the report to convince European Union (EU) officials to attack the problem through public education, and to provide security for Jewish communities.

"We are not trying to be alarmist," report author Ilan Moss told JTA. "But we do see that European political discourse can be slanted, with European politicians feeling comfortable publicly supporting Hezbollah and treating it as a liberation organization."

In Austria, 83 anti-Semitic acts were recorded from April 2006 to August 2006, up from 50 during the same period in 2005. Anti-Semitic letters sent to the Jewish community of Vienna "drastically increased" during the war, with a number of writers comparing Austria's Jewish leaders to Nazis.

This sentiment was popularized by Austria's two extreme-right parties, both of which are currently in Parliament.

France also saw an increase in the number of anti-Semitic events, with 61 incidents during the war, up 79 per cent over the same period last year.

At demonstrations across France in support of Lebanon, placards read, "Death to the Jews – Death to Israel," and Stars of David were emblazoned with swastikas.

Nonetheless, Shimon Samuels, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Paris office, said the "blowback" of anti-Semitism that occurred in France after the Palestinian intifadah began in 2000 was not as strong during the conflict with Hezbollah.

"This is probably because the people who rioted a year ago and who would be likely to attack a synagogue were more focused on attacking the French system," he said, referring to October 2005 riots in Paris suburbs by Muslim youths protesting discrimination, poor housing conditions and unemployment.

Israel is personal for U.S. speaker-elect Pelosi

By JENNIFER JACOBSON
JTA

WASHINGTON — Before a packed meeting of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) three years ago, U.S. Representative Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, connected her political support for the Jewish state with her personal life.

"My daughter is Catholic. My son-in-law is Jewish," she said. "Last week I celebrated my birthday and my grandchildren – ages 4 and 6 – called to sing Happy Birthday. And the surprise, the real gift, was that they sang it in Hebrew."

Now that the Democrats have taken control of the U.S. House of Representatives, the party is expected to install Pelosi, 66, as speaker, making her the first woman to hold the position that is two heartbeats away from the U.S. presidency.

Political observers say it's no surprise that the congresswoman from San Francisco considers herself close to the Jews.

The daughter of Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., a former mayor of Baltimore, Pelosi grew up in a Democratic family with Jewish neighbours and friends.

"She likes to say that, growing up in Baltimore, she went to a bar or bat mitzvah every Saturday," Amy Friedkin, a former president of AIPAC and a friend of Pelosi's for 25 years, wrote in an e-mail to JTA.

Friedkin noted that there's even a soccer field in the Haifa area of Israel named after the lawmaker's family.

While the Republicans campaigned partly on the premise that support for Israel among Democrats has waned, exit polls from last week's voting show that Democrats won an overwhelming majority of the Jewish vote.

With Pelosi as speaker, Jewish activists and officials are confident the U.S. Congress will remain strongly pro-Israel.

"I've heard her say numerous times that the single greatest achievement of the 20th century" was the founding of the modern State of Israel, Friedkin wrote. "She has been a great friend of the U.S.-Israel relationship during her entire time in Congress and is deeply committed to strengthening that relationship."

Sam Lauter, a pro-Israel activist in San Francisco, has known Pelosi for nearly 40 years. He was five years old when the Pelosis moved into his San Francisco neighborhood, he recalls. The two families lived on the same street.

"She's one of the classiest," most "straightforward people you could ever meet," Lauter said. "She's incredibly loyal."

Lauter said the Pelosis used to attend the first night of the Passover seder at his parents' house.

"As far as the Jewish community is concerned, she feels our issues in her soul," he said.

To illustrate his point, Lauter told a Pelosi story that has become almost legendary in the Jewish community.

At an AIPAC luncheon in San Francisco right after the Sept. 11 terror attacks, Pelosi was speaking when an alarm sounded.

"Everybody started getting nervous, scrambling toward the door," Lauter recalled. One person, though, was reading the words of Hatikvah, the Israeli national anthem, above the din. It was Pelosi.

"It actually calmed the crowd," Lauter said. "You could see people actually smiling, saying 'Wow.'"

This "wasn't something done purposefully to show everyone that Nancy Pelosi supports the Jewish community," he said. It "actually came from inside her."

Lauter and others say Pelosi will have to draw on that inner strength as speaker, since Lauter predicted that she will hear from those in the Jewish community who argue that Democrats no longer support Israel the way they used to.

Some Republicans, in fact, questioned Pelosi's support for Israel this summer. The congresswoman ended up removing her name as a co-sponsor from a House resolution supporting the Jewish state during its war with Hezbollah because it did not address the protection of civilians.

While Pelosi's aides said she was not going to lend her name to a resolution that did not contain a word she had written, Republicans criticized the move.

"It highlights a real wave within the Democratic Party that wants a more 'evenhanded' approach on these issues, and that wants to view Israel through the same prism as we do Hezbollah," Matt Brooks, the executive director of the Republican Jewish Coalition, said at the time. "Watering down is not acceptable right now."

Brooks could not be reached for comment last week.

For his part, Lauter believes the argument about the Democrats and Pelosi is false. For instance, he noted Pelosi's quick response to former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's description of Israel's settlement policies as "apartheid" in a forthcoming book.

Pelosi publicly announced that Carter does not speak for the Democratic Party on Israel.

Rabbi Doug Kahn, director of the Jewish Community Relations Council in San Francisco, also applauded Pelosi's repudiation of Carter's position.

He has known Pelosi since she started representing his district in 1987. Rabbi Kahn said his group has always had an excellent working relationship with her. And he praised her passion for issues that relate to equal opportunity, social justice and peace.

Rabbi Kahn, echoing Lauter's point, said that Pelosi, coming from a city with such a liberal political reputation, will face challenges from the liberal segments of the Democratic Party that have criticized Israeli policies.

But he's confident that Pelosi, as speaker, will be effective in persuading people with a broad range of views on the Middle East, the importance of maintaining bipartisan support for Israel.

When it comes to Israel, "she truly gets it," said Matt Dorf, a consultant to the Democratic National Committee. She gets "Israel's value and asset to U.S. security" and its "importance as the only democracy in the Middle East."

Jewish organizational officials also commend Pelosi's record on Jewish communal issues.

William Daroff, vice president for public policy for the United Jewish Communities, the federation system's umbrella group and a Republican himself, said the lawmaker has helped ensure federal funding of Jewish family service agencies and Jewish hospitals and has supported government programs and policies that Jewish organizations value, such as Medicare and Medicaid.

He also noted that Reva Price, Pelosi's liaison to the Jewish community for 1½ years, came from the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the umbrella group of local community relations councils.

Bringing on board such an insider was "really a masterful stroke," Daroff said.

Price, he added, has done a wonderful job of playing "traffic cop" with Jewish organizations and in making sure that Pelosi's agenda is in tune with that of the Jewish community.

She's been "a real champion of making sure the Jewish community is well served," Daroff said of the lawmaker. "I'm sure she'll continue to be a champion."

Gay pride rally peaceful

About 2,000 people gathered last Friday under heavy police guard for a gay pride rally at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Participants waving rainbow flags and holding signs calling for civic equality thronged the stadium at the university's Givat Ram campus. The venue was a compromise between gay activists and people opposed to a larger march through the streets of the city. The rally followed two weeks of violent anti-march protests.

'Technical failure' in Gaza

An Israeli artillery barrage that killed 18 Palestinian civilians went off course because of a "technical failure," Ehud Olmert said. "I checked it, and I verified it," the prime minister said last week as he announced the results of the army's probe into the incident in the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun. Olmert said he was "very distressed" by Nov. 8's carnage, but added that such accidents could recur given Israel's need to combat Palestinian terrorists in Gaza.

Israel could hit Iran: Sneh

Israel's deputy defence minister said Israel reserves the option of striking Iran's nuclear program. "I consider it a last resort," Ephraim Sneh told the Jerusalem Post last Friday. "But even the last resort is sometimes the only resort." Government spokespeople said Sneh's views don't necessarily represent those of the government.

Olmert tops 'corrupt' list

Ehud Olmert came first in a survey ranking Israeli government ministers the public considers corrupt. Forty-two per cent of those polled for the survey, which was published last week at the annual Sderot Conference on the Economy, named the Israeli prime minister as the "most corrupt cabinet member." He was followed by the minister for strategic threats, Avigdor Lieberman at 26 per cent, and Defence Minister Amir Peretz at 23 per cent.

We thank all applicants for their interest, however, only those selected will be contacted.

School grant in Baltimore may set trend

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish day school officials are looking at a recent $15-million (US) tuition-relief grant from the Baltimore-based Harry and Jeanette Weinberg Foundation and the Associated: Jewish Community Federation of Baltimore as a trend-setting move to alleviate one of the biggest challenges facing Jewish education.

The private Weinberg Foundation, which has more than $2 billion in assets, announced recently that it will contribute $2 million a year for the next five years to the Baltimore area's 12 Jewish day schools. The federation will contribute $1 million per year.

The grants will start in 2007, but the foundation also announced that it would immediately give an additional $1 million to the schools.

There are more than 200,000 students in 750 Jewish day schools across the United States, and Baltimore – with some 6,000 students in a community of roughly 100,000 – has one of the highest concentrations in the country, according to Lawrence Ziffer, executive vice president of the city's Center for Jewish Education, which worked with the foundation and the federation to write the grant.

In the past, the foundation had made individual grants to 10 area schools, foundation trustee Barry Schloss told JTA.

"But we said, 'This doesn't meet the needs of our community,'" Schloss said. "We all realized there needed to be more."

Over the past 10 years, the federation's allocation for Jewish day schools has grown from $900,000 a year to more than $3 million as the school system has blossomed, federation president Marc Terrill said.

Still, more than $300,000 of needs went unfunded, Terrill said. The schools cost between $6,000 and $12,000 per year, according to the Center for Jewish Education, and the new grant will double the amount they get through the federation.

Monies to be used only for scholarships

"The need is rather pronounced," Terrill said. "There are people that are unfortunately victims of harsh economic times. There are also those who are relatively affluent, but when you factor in two, three, four or five kids for which they're paying full tuition for day schools, it's not the prettiest of pictures. It's almost like self-imposed poverty, although it's poverty with an enlightened purpose."

Just more than half of the students at Baltimore day schools receive some kind of financial aid, Ziffer said.

The money from the new grant is to be used only for scholarships.

Recipients must demonstrate need, and the foundation has required that schools still maintain their current levels of scholarship giving, Schloss said. He added that over the next five years, the foundation would like to see the community create an endowment fund to subsidize Jewish education.

There are no official plans to do so yet, but continuing to subsidize the school system at about $3 million per year would take a $65 million fund.

The Weinberg Foundation and the Baltimore federation are not the first to tackle the day school tuition issue. The Avi Chai Foundation, a private New York- and Jerusalem-based foundation aimed at increasing Jewish learning, ran a program that gave $3,000 vouchers to students at four day schools in Atlanta and Cleveland from 1999 to 2000. Numerous family foundations across the country have started funds either to cap tuition or to provide tuition relief at local Jewish schools.

The largest individual gift came from a group of anonymous families who made a $45-million donation to three schools in Boston, $15 million of which was to be used for tuition relief.

In Milwaukee, the Helen Bader Foundation set up a similar fund – though on a much smaller scale, at $500,000 per year for three years – to help the area's 600 Jewish day school students, according to Tobey Libber, the foundation's program director.

Other Jewish communities, such as Los Angeles, MetroWest New Jersey and Chicago, are in the process of deciding how to tackle the tuition problem with similar grants, according to Rabbi Joshua Elkin, executive director of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education.

But the Weinberg grant is an important one, he said.

"I believe that there is momentum building, and I believe that this grant is not only part of a trend, but this is a pace-setting decision that Weinberg has made," Elkin said. "It's not simply the size of the grant. It's the fact that it's partnered with the federation and is intended to be spent over the next five years. It provides an immediate infusion."

The Baltimore grant "hopefully will become a model," said Yossi Prager, Avi Chai's North American executive director. "Affordability already is the single largest concern of the day school community, and the crunch is likely to get worse since budgets for schools, Jewish and non-Jewish, are rising faster than inflation. This is a tremendous start in tackling a very serious problem."

Separation, RRSPs, capital gains

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Q My wife and I are separating. I have about $50,000 more in RRSPs than she does. I also own two rental properties of equal value. Each has gone up in price by about $100,000 since purchase. I plan to transfer one of these rental properties to my wife as part of our matrimonial settlement. Everything else we own, such as our home, is registered in joint names. Only the RRSPs and these two rental properties are in separate names. Must I cash in $50,000 of RRSPs and give her half? If I do so at my current income level I will have to pay taxes at my marginal rate of 40% on the $50,000, before I can give her half of what's left "after taxes." In addition, will I pay capital gains tax on the rental property if I transfer one of them to my wife?

A No to your first question. Maybe to your second. If you sign a written separation agreement in which the spouses state their intention to equalize their RRSPs as a separate matter, then under the Income Tax Act (Canada) you are permitted to "rollover" tax-free the entire $50,000. The separation agreement must say that the transfer of the RRSPs between spouses is being done in respect of a settlement arising out of marriage.

The spouses also must file a CRA Form 2220 and a copy of the separation agreement with the CRA within 30 days of the property transfer. Normally family law lawyers attach this form as a schedule to the separation agreement, signed at the same time.

Transfer of land or non-RRSP securities is different. You can transfer such property to her without either spouse paying capital gains tax at the time of the transfer by stipulating that the transfer is part of your property settlement in a written separation agreement. However, until you are divorced any capital gains tax payable if she sells the property will be "attributed" to you; i.e. you pay it.

Solution? Since a pre-divorce disposition by your wife could result in capital gains tax on their sale (approximately 25%, at most) then you can also sign and file an "Election" under section 74.5(3)(b) of the Tax Act with your separation agreement. Once filed, your wife shall be solely responsible for any capital gains tax on any increase in the property's value when she disposes of the property. However, she may only want to pay for any increase after receiving the property and may well refuse to sign this Election. But at least both of you will know that you both face this choice to file such Election, or not, and then negotiate who should pay for how much of the capital gains tax on any increase in the property's value.

Novel loosely based on black sheep in author's family

The Violin Lover by Susan Glickman, Goose Lane Editions.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It's been six months since Susan Glickman's debut novel hit Canadian bookstores, but interest in The Violin Lover has hardly subsided.

Glickman reads from the critically acclaimed novel at the Vancouver JCC Jewish Book Festival on Nov. 19 and 20 and at the Winnipeg Jewish Book Fair on Nov. 21. She is also the opening author of the Book and Bagels literary series at Toronto's Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at 11 a.m. on Dec. 3.

"I am thrilled to be back at the JCC," she says. "The last time I read there was many years ago with the late Miriam Waddington, and Anne Michaels, pre-Fugitive Pieces. The JCC has been a big part of my life. Both my two kids went to nursery school [there under former nursery school director] Hélène Comay, and I worked out there for many years."

The Toronto-based writer, 53, the wife of glass artist Toan Klein, is thrilled with the critical response to Violin Lover. "I got wonderful reviews in the Globe, the National Post, the Montreal Gazette and several other publications," she says.

"As a first novelist you're praying to get noticed at all. Space usually goes to the people who already made a name for themselves."

Glickman, who holds a doctorate in English, is hardly unknown in the literary world. An acclaimed poet, she has published five books of poetry.

Picturesque & the Sublime: A Poetics of the Canadian Landscape (McGill-Queen's University Press, 1998), her award-winning book of literary criticism, garnered her the Gabrielle Roy Prize for best book in Canadian literary criticism and the Raymond Klibansky Prize for best work in the humanities.

Glickman says that she had to work at making the transition from poetry to novel writing.

"The novel is a much larger structure… I had wonderful input from my editor to help make the book more accessible to the readers."

She explains that poetry is more abstract, with more imagery, while prose requires "more character development and more plot."

She compares the experience of writing a novel to viewing a movie. "I felt like I was watching the characters. I wasn't prepared for how independent the characters would become and how they would have their own world that I would be visiting."

Susan Glickman

The Violin Lover, which is set in London in the mid-1930s, is loosely based on the life of Glickman's great-great-uncle, Sam Nagley, the black sheep of her maternal family. "His story was expunged from family history," says Glickman, adding that she only learned of his existence in 1997, while visiting cousins in England.

"He was wiped out of the family tree. It was a real family scandal. The story stayed with me. I felt I had to write this story as a novel. I wanted to celebrate him because he had been erased."

She describes the book as reality fiction, adding that the characterization of Ned, the protagonist, is fictional, but the story line is based on real facts about her uncle's life.

It's very much a love story between Ned, a physician and an accomplished violinist, and Clara, a young widow with three small children. They're an unlikely match. Ned is an assimilated Jew, while Clara is comfortable with her Jewishness.

Their two worlds intersect through music when Clara's eldest son, Jacob, a gifted pianist, becomes Ned's protégé.

Clara, Glickman says, is a fictional character. "She is totally made up."

The London setting of the book pays homage to Glickman's own British roots. Her maternal great-grandparents, Louis and Dora Wolfe, came from Yorkshire, immigrating to Canada in 1907. Sam Nagley is Dora Wolfe's youngest brother.

The Wolfes settled in Montreal, Glickman's hometown, but the family maintained their ties with their British relatives.

Over the years, Glickman spent a considerable amount of time in England. She did her master's in English literature at Oxford University and then worked in a London publishing house.

The time in England offered Glickman an opportunity to connect with her British relatives, Her familiarity with London made it possible for her to write The Violin Lover without visiting the various London landmarks she describes in the book. "I went back to London later to check for accuracy, and I enriched the story with more detail."

She says it took years to get the book published. "I wrote it eight years ago."

An agent advised her to do a second draft, but with that completed she still struggled to find a publisher.

As she puts it, "The book spent two years in exile in my drawer. I went back to teaching I was so disheartened."

But rejection by publishers is past history now. With the success of The Violin Lover, Glickman has been able to cut back on teaching and focus on her second novel.

"I was sorry to say goodbye to the characters in Violin Lover because they had become part of my family, however, I'm really enjoying the new novel. Every novel is a journey through a new place in time."

Bone marrow drive at BJCC for Toronto lawyer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One would expect that someone who exercises, cycles 100-kilometre marathons and is a long-term vegetarian would be in the peak of health. Tzvi (Harry) Golish, a lawyer in his 50s, used to be. But he has been diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia and his only hope is a bone marrow transplant.

Toronto's Jewish community came out by the hundreds to be tested for each one of our brothers and sisters, including Jay Feinberg, Mark Hart, Audi Stanleigh, and "Cathy," who required bone marrow transplants.

The drive for Golish will be held at the Studio Theatre in the Leah Posluns Theatre of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, on Nov. 26, from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. There is no charge for the test, the results of which will be shared with the Canadian, American and international bone marrow registries.

The drive is being carried out under the auspices of The Gift of Life, which is based in Boca Raton, Fla. The organization was founded by Feinberg, a young man who won his battle with cancer, and his family. The Toronto drive is being organized by Tammy Balitsky, a longtime friend of Golish's.

Previous drives involved a blood test. Now, due to newer and less invasive technology, a simple mouth swab collects DNA, which is all that is required.

Balitzky said that Golish, a lawyer, as is his wife, Sharon, is the father of seven children, ranging in age from five to 19. He is totally committed to his family, she said. An athlete, she says, he "bikes nearly everywhere he goes." An observant Jew, he spends much of his free time studying Torah and Talmud.

Golish has been ill for several years. While for the past year or so he has been in remission, last month the cancer returned. He has received treatment at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital and at the M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Texas. Right now, he is receiving a new treatment at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore. It is not known, as the article went to press, how successful it has been.

The best chance for a successful bone marrow match comes from someone from the same ethnic background as Golish – east European Ashkenazi Jewish. His wife; his children; his brother and sister, Kenney and Esther; and family and friends who have been tested are not a match.

If your DNA is comparable, you will be contacted by Gift of Life for further tests. If you are found to be a match, the operation to remove your bone marrow will take place. Although there is some pain, it is easily controlled by analgesics.

For more information about the drive, call Tammy Balitzky, 416-667-7599.

For more information about bone marrow donations, contact Gift of Life at 1-800-9MARROW or www.giftoflife.org.

Toronto jazz drummer beats her own path

Some people would view getting kicked out of class for incessant penciltapping on their desk a bad omen; Lorie Wolf called it providence.

In the 10 years since graduating from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where she tapped her way into trouble, she has doggedly followed her musical inclinations and become one of Canada's emerging jazz drummers.

"I didn't choose drums," she said. "I just always was a drummer. Even before I knew what I was doing."

Started playing klezmer so her mom would be happy

Her abilities have won her acclaim at home and abroad.

Last January she was tabbed by the International Association for Jazz Education (IAJE) to be the drummer for its prestigious Sisters In Jazz collegiate all-stars performance at its annual conference in New York city.

That led to a subsequent performance in May at the Mary Lou Williams Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C., where she performed with the Sisters in Jazz for thousands of people at the Kennedy Center.

Wolf credits that performance as the one that really put her on the jazz-industry map.

"[That] gig really changed my life," she said. "It was very encouraging to me. My confidence got put into place. Since then, I've been writing [music] like mad."

It also inspired her to begin work on a suite of music based on the works of the late Nobel Prize-winning author Isaac Bashevis Singer, she said.

It's just one more thing to add to her already full schedule.

When she's not teaching for Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music's Learning Through the Arts program, she's usually busy gigging around town with one of the following four bands: Sisters of Sheynville, a Yiddish-swing ensemble; the Lithuanian Empire, a funk-klezmer outfit; Circa Jazz, a straight-out jazz troupe; and Balagan, a Hebrew-world-music group.

Music permeated Wolf's life from childhood on. Her father, Sam, used to play accordion and guitar and sing for her as a child, while her mother, Gisela, loved classical music.

"I remember when I was seven I would listen to music and say to myself, 'I can play that,'" she said. "Obviously, I can relate to [Jewish] music, and I read a lot of Jewish literature."

Wolf admits that becoming a musician caused some small concern for her traditional parents. But she eventually made believers out of them by playing to their heritage.

"My mother was not very pleased about my career choice and my instrument choice," she said. "I started playing klezmer so she could stay happy. She started coming to my concerts, and would enjoy the music I was playing. It was really important to me to convince [her] that playing drums could be a musical thing."

Never happier than when she is learning

The choice proved fruitful and led to numerous job offers.

"In Toronto, once people find out you have a klezmer band, they want you to play at their parties and weddings... to give it that Jewish feel," she said.

"I love working. But I also keep Shabbat. So how many gigs do I miss because of that? Lots!" she said, laughing. "But it's what I've chosen to do. I just want people to call me whenever they need a drummer."

The last thing Wolf wants is to become complacent.

Though she already has two post-secondary degrees, a bachelor of fine arts from York University and a bachelor of education from the University of Toronto, she isn't content to rest on her laurels.

She's been enrolled in Humber College's School of Creative and Performing Arts advanced diploma program in music since 2004.

"I'm doing it to better myself as a drummer and be around other musicians, not for the degree," she said.

Though she has met and befriended many of her drummer idols, played to audiences across North America and recorded on numerous albums, she is never happier than when she's learning.

"It's like [being] at Hogwarts Academy of Magical Arts," she said, likening Humber College to the fictional school in the Harry Potter fantasy book series.

"It's like all the students are magicians and the teachers are wizards. You walk down the halls and peek into classrooms and there's amazing stuff going on," said Wolf.

Sisters of Sheynville begin work on a new album this month, and Wolf expects to play at the Montreal and Halifax jazz festivals next summer.

Tikkun olam through groovy sounds

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Sometimes tikkun olam takes strange and wonderful paths.

Sharon Ross's journey to healing the world starts with teeth and ends in music.

Though Ross makes her living as a dentist, the 34-year-old is also co-founder and co-producer of Toronto's annual Open Door Festival of Music.

Founded in in 2000 by Ross and her friend Marysia Czarski, the festival helps raise awareness and funds for the city's three Red Door Shelters, while simultaneously giving unknown local musicians the chance to be discovered.

Red Door Shelters provide emergency housing for victims of domestic violence and people in desperate need of accommodation. They also help residents stabilize their lives with a range of educational and counselling services.

"We chose Red Door because they go by the notion of teaching people how to help themselves," said Ross.

For her, there is no sweeter synthesis of causes.

"I've always been an avid music lover," said Ross, whose father owns the venerable Rex Jazz and Blues Bar on Queen Street West.

"I think it's really important for people to make a difference in their community," she said. "I'm combining tikkun olam while doing something that I very much enjoy and believe in."

The festival is a labour of love and an expression of humanitarianism for all involved.

"None of the musicians get paid for their time and energy, and there are a lot of volunteers," said Ross, who works on booking the event from mid-summer until the show itself.

As a further display of goodwill, Ross offers participating musicians free dental care in lieu of payment.

"A lot of musicians do come to me yearly for services," she said. "They have a really rough time getting their music out there and it's nice to give back to this community that I get so much out of."

Over the last five years, the Open Door Festival has raised more than $25,000 for the Red Door Shelters and helped many musicians establish their careers.

This year's benefit will be hosted by Doctors Without Borders communications director and former CBC personality Avril Benoit.

The concert takes place Nov. 22 at the Mod Club, 722 College St., 7:30 p.m.

Scheduled to perform are Julie Michels and the MCC Choir, Andy Stochansky, Craig Cardiff, Ember Swift, Kellylee Evans and Dala.

Tickets are $20 in advance, $25 at the door and $15 for students.

Book documents neglected period of Holocaust

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The stories of some 300,000 Jews who escaped from Nazi-occupied Poland into Russian-occupied Poland and the Soviet Union after September 1939 are a part of Holocaust literature that few survivors have documented.

Morris (Moishe) Gruda, a soft-spoken Toronto businessman, philanthropist and noted Yiddish writer and poet, lived through the trauma of such an escape. Gruda has written an insightful account of this long-neglected period of Holocaust history.

Titled Tricks of Fate: Escape, Survival and Rescue 1939-1945, Gruda's story was written in Yiddish and edited and translated into English by Adam Fuerstenberg. It is the third volume in the Holocaust Memoirs Series co-published by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Mosaic Press.

The book will be launched on Dec, 4 at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto at 7:30 p.m.

Gruda's autobiography takes the reader from his childhood in Rozhan, Poland, through his teenage years as an apprentice as a ladies' tailor and his escape, as a 20-year-old in 1939, days before the Germans arrived. He lived with Germans for the next five years, a harrowing experience.

Gruda's story verifies that truth is stranger than fiction. He documents his trek from place to place – Lomza, Pultusk, Kiev, Rostov, Stalingrad, Astrakhan, back to Kotovsk and the Odessa region.

With his philosophy of never losing hope, no matter how dangerous or bleak the situation, Gruda's personal odyssey is a tribute to the survivors as well as those who perished from slave labour, hunger, inhumane deprivation, and cruelty.

Gruda's family numbered close to 60 in 1939. Only 11 survived. "I am still living every moment of the events that are etched on my brain," he said. "The book has helped me release some of the tension."

Gruda said that at one time he was unable to write about the horrors he had experienced, although over the years he has spoken to groups about that time in his life. Five years ago, his daughter-in-law in Jerusalem appealed to him to write his autobiography and he agreed to do it to counter Holocaust denial.

"Recently, I, like other survivors, had become alarmed at the assertions that there had been no Holocaust, that there had been no six million Jewish men, women and children starved, tortured and murdered in the most systematic and brutal manner that the world had experienced," he said.

Morris Gruda

"It became important to me that my children and grandchildren hear the truth of what happened directly from me, so they would have a personal defence against these lies."

He added that he wanted them to learn how one must act under such terrifying conditions and not lose one's humanity, "to have the strength to overcome and continue living a normal and just life."

After the war, Gruda was unable to go to Palestine. In 1947, an immigration committee from Canada arrived in Europe looking for tailors and furriers. He was approved and arrived here in 1948.

Gruda is the father of two and grandfather of 13. "Despite the fact that they tried to destroy us, we have survived and have established wonderful families – doctors, professors, lawyers and community workers – who are contributing to the well-being of society," he said.

Tricks of Fate is available at amazon.ca and Jewish bookstores. For information about the launch, call 905-889-4145.

Film tells the story of a tormented soul

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian filmmaker and Oscar nominee Arthur Lipsett has virtually been forgotten, but thanks to his close friend, Martin Lavut, his memory flickers brightly, like one of his eccentric shorts.

Lavut's biopic, Remembering Arthur, which will be screened at the Rendezvous with Madness Film Festival on Nov. 17, is a celebration of his relatively brief life and career.

In his heyday at the National Film Board of Canada in the 1960s, Lipsett was something of a boy wonder, churning out groundbreaking experimental documentaries that challenged the notion of what film could be.

Lipsett's first film, Very Nice, Very Nice, a seven-minute collage of images set to sound, earned him an Academy Award nomination and kudos from Hollywood director Stanley Kubrick. In a letter to the young Montrealer, Kubrick rated it as "imaginative and brilliant."

After Very Nice, Very Nice, Lipsett, whose films were imbued with a dark sensibility, produced yet more avant-garde documentaries, notably 21-87, Free Fall and A Trip Down Memory Lane.

Lipsett had admirers, to be sure. Donald Brittain, the accomplished NFB documentarian, said that he was as close to a genius as he had ever seen.

But at the end of the day, Lipsett was misunderstood and not necessarily appreciated. The powers-that-be at the NFB found his films difficult and baffling, and barely tolerated him.

Lipsett studied visual art at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts under the supervision of Arthur Lismer, a member of the Group of Seven. A scholarship student, he was hired by the NFB to work in the animation department after his graduation. One of his co-workers was the legendary Norman McLaren.

Before making his first film, Lipsett was an editor and a cameraman. In assembling Very Nice, Very Nice, he scrounged together outtakes from other films. Lipsett, who had a knack for juxtaposing disparate images and throwing viewers off balance, was a master of what a friend describes as "controlled hysteria."

Friends recall him as a sweet young man filled with curiosity. But when he was older, he was cantankerous and gradually descended into sadness and madness.

His last NFB film, N-Zone, was beyond the comprehension of even his backers, while his final independent film, Strange Codes, which he finished in 1974, seemed somewhere in outer space, an odd mélange of sounds and images.

After leaving the NFB, Lipsett was permanently unemployed and grew stranger and stranger, his friends and colleagues recall. "He was pretty nuts," says a friend. "He was, like, gone," observes a former colleague.

By the mid-1970s, Lipsett was at the mercy of screaming and jumping fits, he mumbled rather than talked, he stayed up late at night listening to the hum of a fridge and he looked like a mess. By then, he lived in his aunt's house, sleeping on a sofa.

Mental illness plagued his family. When Lipsett was a boy, his mother committed suicide, taking rat poison.

Inevitably, Lipsett ended up in a psychiatric institution. On the day he was discharged, two weeks away from his 50th birthday, he followed in his mother's footsteps, letting himself be swallowed by the darkness.

Remembering Arthur is a sensitive portrait of a tormented soul, but oddly enough, though there are multiple photographs of Lipsett in Lavut's film, there is not a single interview with him.

This is a huge gap in an otherwise laudable film.

Fur portrays iconoclastic photographer

Armed with a Rolleiflex camera, Diane Arbus was a creative force writ large.

Famous for her stark and quirky photographs of outsiders, from dwarves to giants, she cut a swath through the corridors of American photography, and perhaps changed it forever.

Arbus, whose work was showcased in the finest magazines and was was exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art, was born in 1923, the daughter of David and Gertrude Nemerov, successful furriers who sold their wares at a posh Fifth Avenue shop frequented by the wealthy.

When she was 18, she married fashion photographer Allan Arbus and soon became his assistant. When her marriage broke down in 1959, she came into her own as an artist of singular talent and originality.

Steven Shainberg's dreamy biopic, Fur: An Imaginary Portrait of Diane Arbus, which opens here on Nov. 17, is what the title suggests: a free-flowing, semi-fictional account of the life of an iconoclast.

Shainberg's two-hour film, which takes place in Manhattan in 1958, is based on Patricia Bosworth's biography. It merges reality with fantasy, and the result is invariably intriguing and mesmerizing.

Nicole Kidman in Fur

Nicole Kidman, the Australian actress, plays Arbus. Although she bears absolutely no physical resemblance to her subject, she acquits herself enchantingly.

Her blue eyes sparkling, her sculpted nose a model of form, and her tentative voice a seductive whisper, she is a captivating presence, an upper-class woman whose dark sensibility is plainly at odds with her ordinary existence as a housewife and helpmate.

Kidman's Arbus is self-effacing, repressed, vulnerable and modest to a fault.

When she is asked whether she is a photographer, like her hard-working and accomplished husband (played by Ty Burrell), she practically breaks down in tears and flees in self-disgust.

By chance, she meets Lionel Sweeney (Robert Downey Jr.), an unusual neighbour and a recluse who suffers from an incurable and rare medical condition. He initiates Arbus into an Alice-in-Wonderland universe in which mainstream values and notions of beauty and ugliness are challenged.

Downey, his soulful eyes a picture of torment, holds his own with Kidman in virtually every scene.

Fur is not only a celebration of a woman's journey of self-discovery, but an improbable love story.

Shainberg and his scriptwriter, Erin Cressida Wilson, have created a film that is by turns odd, eerie and inescapably beautiful.

Names in the News II: Artist-photographer Yaacov Kaszemacher was raised in postwar Paris, associated with the jazz artists of the Beat Generation and lived in Greenwich Village at the height of the 1960s counterculture. He became known for his psychedelic light shows and photographic slides of various subjects and special effects. In his early 30s he began to explore his Jewish heritage and moved to Israel, eventually settling in Safed, where he now has a gallery.

His desire to share Judaism with others has sparked his return to photography and he has been widely exhibited in international venues. His favourite subjects include elements in Safed and locally in nature. He especially likes to portray the timeless aspects of Jewish life.

Kaszemacher's work is being featured in a gala benefit art show hosted by the Mesorah Montessori preschool to aid families in the artisans' quarter of Safed. P.I. Fine Art Gallery, 1200 Castlefield Ave. Saturday, Nov. 18, 8 p.m. Again on Sunday, Nov. 19, 9 a.m. to 1 p.m.

Basketball star joins his dad at U of T

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Deborah Nyman is surely relieved that her husband and son will be on the same side this season after Ben Katz transferred to the University of Toronto for his final year of basketball eligibility.

The arts and science undergraduate and four-year starter at McMaster University is back home in the big city playing for his dad Mike, who coaches the U of T Blues basketball team, while pursuing a master's degree in industrial relations and human resources. (Athletes transferring to another school normally have to sit out a year, but the rule doesn't apply to graduate students.)

While the decision to come play for his dad may have seemed like an easy one to make, Katz said there were many factors that he considered before leaving Hamilton, where he made three trips with the Marauders to the national championships.

"It's always good to have degrees from different universities," he said in a phone interview after a weekend trio of exhibition games against NCAA schools in early September. "It shows some diversity in your abilities.

"My dad being [at U of T] was obviously a factor in terms of transferring out of Mac, but it wasn't so much that I chose [the school] just to come play for my dad. There were a lot of other reasons that played into the decision. I wanted a change in scenery, life."

While at Mac, the 6-2 shooting guard was a member of the OUA West all-rookie team in 2001-02, a first-team OUA All-Star in 2003-04, and last year was the OUA West nominee for the Ken Shields Award, presented annually to the Canadian university athlete who exemplifies outstanding achievement in basketball, academics and community involvement.

Last spring, he won McMaster's Les Prince Award, which is given to the person who demonstrates leadership and outstanding community service. His credentials include countless hours working at basketball camps, as well as coaching a midget boys basketball team.

Over the summer, Katz and some high school buddies run an annual basketball camp called Concrete Hoops, and they expect to be teaching the sport in Brazil over the next year.

In the coming months, Katz also plans to be involved coaching kids in a basketball program at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

While sitting out most of the 2004-05 season with a torn ligament in his knee, Katz put his time off the court to good use by working with his mom to publish two basketball books for struggling readers.

"The idea was to get them reading something they're already interested in," he said of the books, titled Hoops and Above the Rim. Katz also helped establish a reading reward program with 300 male elementary school students.

Mike Katz [Photo courtesy of the U of T]

He returned to the court last season, averaging 12.1 points and 5.2 rebounds a game.

Katz hopes to improve on those numbers in the upcoming campaign, which resumed with a tournament at McGill University last month, and he's glad that he can look to his dad for support and advice on the sidelines.

"I think it's one of those rare opportunities in life to share an experience with your son that's quite satisfying," said Mike Katz, who opposed Ben the last couple of years when Mac and U of T met on the schedule, as well as on another previous occasion when McMaster and Humber College played in the Raptors Cup tournament.

"It's a really unique opportunity, given that I never thought it would happen."

Jim Miller was an 'underrated' Alouette lineman

Obituary

MONTREAL — Jim Miller was the very rare Jewish athlete who advanced to the professional football gridiron and earned a reputation as an underrated but outstanding player.

Miller, who died earlier this month at age 74, was also portrayed as a "wonderful" and "easygoing" person by Sam Etcheverry, a legendary former quarterback for the Montreal Alouettes who played with Miller on that team.

Four years ago, Miller was inducted into McGill University's Sports Hall of Fame for his contributions to sport.

In 2001, Miller was also inducted into the YM-YWHA Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Born on Feb. 20, 1932, he was a commerce student between 1949 and 1952 and played three seasons for the McGill Redmen on the senior squad and was named an all-star in 1952.

He was also an accomplished boxer, representing McGill and Quebec at the 1952 Canadian boxing championships and Olympic trials (for the Helsinki Games) in Vancouver, but he was eliminated after a severe head butt. In 1953, according to the McGill website, he was the 1953 Quebec Golden Gloves champion.

Miller then played as a defensive end from 1953 to 1958 with the Allouettes, and he made three Grey Cup appearances (1954-56), all against the Edmonton Eskimos.

Canadian Press named him an all-star in 1956.

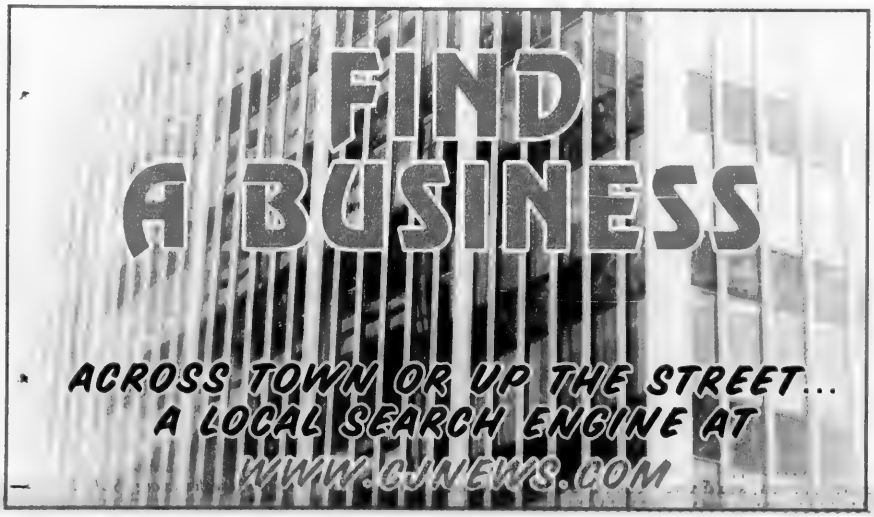
In 1955, Als coach Peahead Walker described Miller to the Montreal Star as "the most underrated player in the league.

"I defy you to find a better defensive end… He's done everything we've asked of him and he's done it well."

Miller also became an accomplished businessman. While with the Als, he managed an appliance company, which he sold in 1972, and then managed a North American real estate company called Miller Properties.

He was also part of a group of businessmen who founded Vendome Stables and owned racehorses.

Miller is survived by his wife Jodi, son Jeffrey, and daughter Nancy.



Inside Back

Gay offspring pose challenge

By MICHAEL GORDON

When I was a teenager in the mid-1950s in Brooklyn, the ultimate insult was to call someone a "fag," or the Yiddish equivalent, a "fegala," even though I didn't really know what it meant. It was not until I was travelling in Europe during my third year of University in 1960 that I actually met and spoke to someone who said he was homosexual. But I had no opportunity to understand his personal challenges, the issues he faced, his life goals, or whether he faced any societal hurdles or difficulties in his cultural milieu.

The Senior Side of Life

It has only been in the past 15 years that I have been acquainted with and had friendships with members of the gay community, allowing me to understand the implications at the personal and societal levels.

More recently, I have had the chance to observe the personal impact on people in same-sex relationships, whether in dating, cohabiting, marriage or child-rearing. It is through this evolutionary growth process that I have come to appreciate the implications for parents and grandparents of knowing that their offspring is homosexual, something that was probably considered anathema or sinful during their own developmental and adult years.

How are loving parents and grandparents to respond to the reality of a child or grandchild's admission of having a sexual orientation that is likely completely alien to them? Rejection is an option, one that, unfortunately, is sometimes adopted, with all the tragic consequences of loss of family structure, meaningful relationships and opportunities to grow and love.

A reluctant and resentful acceptance is another option. Again, this may lead to some strain in the relationship and thus limit the true processes of growth and affection, but it may evolve to a later reconnection and embracing.

A neutral or silent response may be necessary initially, to give time for parents to accommodate themselves to this unexpected path, but it allows time for growth and ultimate acceptance.

The real challenge for parents and grandparents facing the reality that their beloved child and grandchild is taking a relationship path different from the one expected is to look at the situation through the lens of love and growth and the continuation of family connections and life. Some parents and grandparents might fear the reaction of the "community" or the "family" to this non-traditional family structure and be ambivalent as to how to respond.

But the ultimate question arises when child rearing becomes part of the arrangement: can parents or grandparents have nachas from a child born or adopted into a same-sex relationship? The answer is, of course, no less so than from a child born or adopted into a heterosexual or single-parent relationship.

Fortunately, in Canada and some other jurisdictions, there has been a monumental shift in understanding so that same-sex relationships are better recognized and accepted as part of our society's family and community fabric. It is the love encompassed in the relationship that matters.

During last year's same-sex marriage debate in Canada, a lot of negative commentary came from those who, for cultural, personal or religious reasons, objected to accepting or promoting this new legal structure. However, even though it appears that the government debate may be re-opened by Parliament this fall, the compelling legal and ethical arguments are likely to supersede any legislative initiatives.

Parents and grandparents facing the prospect of this usually unexpected step in a loved one's life must find within themselves the strength and devotion to embrace those they love and, if there are any, their offspring, whatever the process of procreation or adoption. They must look to the future of growth and maturing. The nachas and joy will spring forth and fill their world, as it rightfully should.

Bev B's Mulligatawny Soup With an Indian Taste

1/4 c vegetable oil
3 c chopped onions
1 lg tomato chopped
5 garlic cloves, chopped
1 1/2 tblsp garam masala
1 1/2 tblsp ground coriander (optional)
1 tsp turmeric
1/2 tsp cayenne pepper
1/2.tsp cayenne pepper
2 bay leaves
2 c dried red lentils
8 c vegetable broth
1 1/2 c canned chick peas pureed
1 c canned unsweetened coconut milk
1 c canned chick peas (not pureed)
3 tblsp fresh lemon juice

Heat oil in large pot over medium-high heat. Add onions; cook until golden brown, stirring frequently. Add chopped tomato. Add garlic; sauté 2 minutes. Add garam masala, coriander, turmeric, cayenne pepper and bay leaves; stir 1 minute. Add lentils; stir until coated. Add broth and pureed chick peas. Bring to a boil; reduce heat to medium; simmer about 1 hour (until lentils are tender). Discard bay leaves.

Puree soup in blender or with immersible blender. Stir in coconut milk, remaining chick peas and lemon juice. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Hebrew essential in Jewish studies

I remember visiting a newly opened Jewish teachers centre in Chicago many years ago and finding gross errors in Hebrew all over the place.

Seymour Epstein

Everything else in the experimental centre was cutting-edge, and I knew that the management was not intentionally negligent, but merely ignorant of two things: correct Hebrew spelling and the importance of Hebrew in the Jewish studies curriculum.

Once I alerted my colleagues to the problem (it was my job – I had been invited as a consultant), they immediately decided to rectify the situation by hiring a retired Hebrew teacher to correct the errors, and to do some "preventive medicine" by teaching Hebrew to the staff.

This memory came back to me recently as my current colleagues pointed out Hebrew errors in the strangest places: a document from a central Israeli education agency, the literature of a major organization of Jewish educators, some of our own schools.

On the positive side, I think that we in Toronto enjoy a fairly literate leadership compared to other Diaspora communities because of the intensive Hebrew education in many of our schools. In Boston, I was once actually complimented after a lecture given in Hebrew by a woman who identified my elementary school from my Hebrew.

But there is no doubt that as an integral and essential element in a full Jewish education, Hebrew is declining. Recently, we heard of a secondary school overseas that eliminated Hebrew language studies from its Jewish curriculum.

There should be no need to convince readers of The CJN that Hebrew must remain at the core of Jewish studies. While there are different types of Hebrew studied in different settings, two facts argue for the primacy of Hebrew in the curriculum.

- We possess the original version of our most sacred text in its original language.
- We have seen the rebirth of our language as the spoken tongue of the State of Israel.

These two facts make Hebrew a necessity for knowing our past, understanding the present and creatively developing our future.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Don't hang Saddam

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Saddam Hussein is a cruel and pitiless tyrant. The evidence presented at his murder trial showed the Hitlerian character of this man as an autocratic bully. It gave us insight into the underbelly of humanity and the extreme immorality that exists within our world.

URBAN WRITER

Saddam is responsible for the death and torture of thousands of Iraqis, Kurds, Iranians, Israelis and countless other nationals. He raised sons who harassed, raped and murdered fellow citizens, as did the psychopathic characters in the film A Clockwork Orange, who took great pleasure in hurting others and were indifferent to their victims' pain.

My heart tells me Saddam deserves to die.

Rationally and ultimately, however, I believe otherwise – that Saddam's life should be spared – and I disagree with the court's conclusion he should hang by the neck until pronounced dead.

Saddam is a murderer. This is clear. It is difficult to look at his face for too long, although in a strange way we are somehow drawn to it. We resent his presence in our world because of the horrific crimes he committed. And we abhor him because of the Pharaoh-like pomposity in the way he did so – with an insane belief in the divinity of his actions.

Yet despite our disdain for his killing, would we do the same – kill him until he is limp at the end of a noose? Is this justice? Taking a life is taking a life?

Certainly, there are times when it makes sense to execute someone, as in the case of the attempted assassination on Hitler. His death would have halted the death of millions, and incarceration did not appear to be a viable alternative. I, myself, would have pulled the trigger.

But Saddam can be locked away forever, in a place where he couldn't be found by the public, where he can no longer hurt anyone and live out his days, a pathetic character like Rudolf Hess, Hitler's deputy. Hess was tried at Nuremberg, sentenced to life in prison, and was the only prisoner in Spandau prison, where he died in 1987 by suicide.

I also fear a death sentence is a way of assuaging the emotional need of the masses to get revenge. In this light, U.S. President George W. Bush (the former governor of Texas, where executions are held daily) stated that the verdict is "a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy." A major achievement?

Is Bush referring to the fact that the court had the courage to hand down a death sentence? How is this a triumph in the Middle East? It is a daily occurrence. Is he saying that Iraq has improved as a country now that all can watch its former "leader" die at the hands of a court-appointed executioner? More spilled blood is not what Iraqis need to see, regardless of whose veins it flowed through.

Finally, when Saddam is put to death, given the opportunity, millions of people around the world will tune in. It means the execution of a human being – a creation of God – will be a form of entertainment, a celebration of sorts (the Jewish people were reprimanded by the heavens for rejoicing at the death of the Egyptians for this exact reason). And I can't imagine such a sight would be a deterrent to other despots.

Lock up Saddam and make sure the padlock is triple-steel enforced. Do so because we are a civil society and recognize that killing a man when other options are available is more an expression of our anger, a need to get even, than a show of justice and a commanding commitment to life.

Jewish Canada

Shalom
and warm greetings from Israel!

from Stanley Plotnick, President, UIA Federations Canada

This has been an incredible two weeks in Israel. Although I have visited this wonderful land many times, this trip has been unique. It is, after all, in the wake of Israel's recent war, and the country is in a very introspective mood. I realize now more than ever, that we, can—in fact must, help prepare the country for tomorrow and the possibility of another war, at least in the areas that we are able to significantly influence its preparedness.

Over the last few months, more than 100 Canadian Jewish leaders have spent time in Israel to express their solidarity. During my two weeks here, I met with a Mission from Toronto and participated in the laying of the cornerstone for dormitories of Eilat's new branch of the Ben Gurion University; I have joined the UIAFC Solidarity Mission at Tel Hai College in the north where we were honoured for our contributions in its development; and I have met with the Toronto Major Donor Fly-In, sharing thoughts and listening to their perceptions of the needs. Of course, I also had the opportunity to meet and share ideas with world Jewry, at the Keren Hayesod and the Jewish Agency meetings.

I have heard and seen what an important impact we, the Jews of Canada have made over the past months. The accolades are overwhelming!! There is no doubt that, apart from the government of Israel, the most important provider of emergency relief in the north during the trying days of the war, was the Jewish Agency—and we were a vital partner in their success.

The Jewish communities of Canada have made many significant contributions to the State of Israel over our 40 years in operation—however this past summer the Canadian Jewish communities were clearly front and centre among the international Jewish communities.

Canadians help to Rebuild a Resilient Israeli Society

The Canadian Jewish community should be very proud of its outstanding results achieved over the past weeks in mobilizing Israel Emergency Campaigns across the country. We have, once again, demonstrated our dedication and commitment to Israel by exceeding our own expectations. Canadians were quick and decisive, mounting Israel Emergency Campaigns across the country in order to raise the funds to help those who were impacted by the war. As of this date, the Emergency Campaigns have collectively raised $42 million in pledges.

Linda Kislowicz, CEO of UIA Federations Canada, accompanied a group of 15 Canadian Jewish leaders on a fact-finding mission to Israel's northern communities in September. Upon her return to Canada, Linda stated "One of the themes that caught our attention and encompasses so many possible programs is the notion of creating and building circles of resilience—layers of insulation and protection against danger. In this way, Israelis will be better prepared to cope with trauma, resulting in a stronger social environment. We must ensure that we strengthen the social and economic structures so that they are able to retain their population and feel safe and secure."

Through the national collective process, the group reported their findings to the Israel Strategic Advisory Allocation Committee and a set of broad-ranging proposals were developed to encompass education, economic development, and community development that would build circles of resilience. Mark Gurvis, Executive Director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, adds that "the Israel Emergency Campaign and the national collective process, through which we are quickly moving, will help us to take the steps towards building and reinforcing the case for collective community action." We are very excited about the possibility of developing a Canada-wide national project that will make a significant contribution to the Galilee.

We are helping Israel recover from the devastation it suffered over the summer by strengthening its social environment on an individual and communal level, through the work of our agents in Israel which includes the Jewish Agency, the Joint Jewish Distribution Committee and Sacta-Rashi. That is the essence of our partnership with Israel and we should be very proud of our efforts and our results.

Canadian Support for Israel

Prime Minister Stephen Harper

"Israel has the right to defend itself... I think Israel's response under the circumstances has been measured... The onus to end this escalation is on the other side, and I would urge them to return the [Israeli] prisoners." JULY 13, 2006

The Honourable Marlene Jennings, MP, Notre-Dame-de-Grâce – Lachine

"Let me be clear: I wholeheartedly support Israel and its right, indeed its duty, to defend its territory and its citizens from these acts of war. In my view, the sole parties that are responsible for the present devastation are Hezbollah and Hamas." JULY 18, 2006

The Honourable Susan Kadis, MP, Thornhill

"For far too long Israel has fought for its very existence. Israel did not seek these confrontations. It is important to note that the recent actions taken by Israel would not have occurred if UN resolution 1559 had been fully implemented and the terrorist groups, Hamas and Hezbollah, had not entered sovereign Israeli territory and killed and kidnapped Israeli soldiers." JULY 25, 2006

Marc Gold, National Chair, Canada-Israel Committee:

"Hezbollah, like its Palestinian cousin Hamas, has been identified as a terrorist entity by Canada alongside scores of our traditional allies, both for its rejection of Israel's right to exist and its long and horrendous inventory of terrorist attacks throughout the world. A terrorist organization is always at the core of the problem, never part of the solution." AUGUST 21, 2006

The Honourable Irwin Cotler, MP, Mount Royal and former Minister of Justice:

"It is tragic to recall – but imperative to appreciate – that had UN Security Council Resolution 1559 been enforced, there would have been no Hezbollah, no armed attacks, no Israeli response and no casualties, Lebanese or Israeli." AUGUST 26, 2006

The Honourable Bob Rae, former Ontario Premier and candidate for leadership, Liberal Party of Canada:

"To me, it's a terrible tragedy when civilians get killed in a war. But the suggestion of a war crime is something that involves the deliberate and intentional killing of civilians... with respect to the government of Israel, I've never heard a serious suggestion that there was any deliberate targeting of civilians." OCTOBER 11, 2006

Certificate from Prime Minister Ehud Olmert translates as follows:

In recognition and acknowledgement of the exceptional efforts demonstrated by UIA Canada during the battles in the North Summer 5766, July – August 2006

For your true dedication to community values, for the spirit of volunteerism which knows no bounds, for the demonstration of responsibility towards our nation and the willingness to unite in times of crisis, and for your nonstop efforts to benefit the residents of the north.

"We will overcome these hardships, as we always have, shoulder-to-shoulder with our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora. Your unconditional and unwavering support is a source of strength and comfort in good times as in bad."

Ehud Olmert, Prime Minister of Israel

"The Canadian Campaign serves as an example of quick and efficient mobilization. We are very impressed by the depth and the scope of the activities of UIAC."

Avi Pazner, World Chairman of Keren Hayesod-UIA

"The Respite Program as well as the games and recreation equipment financed by your fund was (and still is) virtually priceless for those populations... I would also like to express our gratitude for your Israeli staff's efficient and immediate response, their instant availability and most of all for their tender love and care. As the saying goes "A friend in need is a friend indeed".

Aharon Valency, Head of the Regional Council of the Upper Galilee

"The Israel Emergency Campaign has enabled us to provide assistance to literally tens of thousands of Israelis—making a miserable situation just a little more bearable. We thank you for your support and have no doubt that you will continue to support our efforts when the real work begins – the day after."

Leah Golan, Director General, Jewish Agency for Israel

Ze'ev Bielski, Chairman of the Jewish Agency visits children at a JAFI sponsored summer camp near Petah Tikva.

"... we feel that we are protected, and part of the family, despite the fact that we are practically all alone in the country... the meeting with the psychologist was very helpful...On behalf of the whole family, thanks for the help in this difficult time; it was a welcome break from the fear and panic!"

Olim family who participated on Canadian funded respite in Jerusalem

"It is deeply encouraging to know that we do not stand alone, and that the notion, "All of Israel is responsible for one another" is not just an empty phrase, but a practiced value."

Sara Dagan, Community Director, Kfar Szold

"Our children and youth, trapped in the shelters, were thrilled by the variety of games you sent us and the craft materials; but moreover, they were moved and full of thanks from your dedicated efforts to ease our lives and make our presence in the shelters more bearable."

Advocating for positive dialogue, communication and partnership

Canada Israel Committee Reception (l to r) Jonathon Kalles (QIC), Paule Brunelle M.P. (BQ), Yvan Loubier (BQ) and Karen Eltis (CIC)

The Canada Israel Committee (CIC) has been extremely active throughout the war and its aftermath, working very closely with all of its partners to develop a national advocacy campaign. The campaign was designed to not only enhance existing advocacy programs but also to broaden and reach out to diverse audiences in many different sectors and garner support. This outreach involved both media and the political sectors, and included developing relationships and partnerships with non-Jewish communities, particularly ethnic groups.

One of the immediate results of these efforts was that National Jewish Campus Life began the school year confident that its leaders were prepared to handle the issues surrounding the conflict in the Middle East. Campuses across Canada advertised the need for dialogue, communication and partnership through a campaign entitled "Partners Wanted". A website was launched at www.theroadtopeace.ca and brochures entitled "Don't Accept the Apartheid Lie" were distributed on campuses across the country. So instead of feeling reactive and defensive, our students and staff alike were able to do their work in a positive and proactive manner.

CIC also led several missions to Israel throughout the summer, including an all-party-delegation of parliamentary staffers, a group of Christian student leaders from a campus scholarship program, and together with Quebec Israel Committee (QIC), one group of Quebec journalists and another group of Quebec cultural leaders. The importance of these experiences grew exponentially with the hostilities in the region.

Working with communities across Canada to foster a fair perspective of Israel in the media, editorial board meetings were arranged and op-eds were published in a number of national and local media. Visits to Canada by Israeli academics were organized, including tours to Halifax and Windsor by Canadian Jim Lederman, the longest serving foreign correspondent in Jerusalem. Mr. Lederman met with community leadership, journalists and students on university campuses, briefing them on Israel's recent war in Lebanon.

The CIC also actively supported local federations' sponsorship of mid-summer rallies in support of Israel, with events that attracted thousands of people in communities across Canada. CIC's role, both within the Jewish communities across Canada as well as the broader community, ensures the promotion of an increased understanding between the peoples of Canada and Israel.

Throughout the summer and the period that followed, our advocacy agencies were called upon to deliver quickly, professionally and in very challenging circumstances. Their energy and commitment were evident in the level of results that they achieved.

Spreading the Message across Canadian Schools: FAST

On September 11, 2006, Tony Comper, President and CEO of BMO Financial Group addressed the Canadian Club of Montreal and spoke out against Antisemitism in Canada and abroad. At the same time, he also introduced the FAST (Fighting Antisemitism Together) initiative that he and his wife Elizabeth launched last year in Ontario.

Deeply disturbed by the rise of Antisemitic activities in the spring of 2004, Elizabeth and Tony Comper realized that the most effective message against it had to come from the non-Jewish world. It was in this context that FAST was born—a coalition endorsed by 50 non-Jewish business and community leaders.

FAST approached Canadian Jewish Congress to assist in the development of an educational program that would deal with Antisemitism, discrimination and racism in general. As a result of their collaborative work, Choose Your Voice was introduced in September 2005 in order to educate grade 6, 7 and 8 students about the dangers of bigotry and prejudice.

FAST educational package includes lesson plans, assessment strategy and award-winning video

The key message of the program is: don't be a victim; don't be a perpetrator; don't be a bystander. Choose Your Voice: Choose to be a hero.

Since its launch just over a year ago, Choose Your Voice has received wide acclaim from educators across Canada. The educational package includes all the tools that are necessary to mount the program—lesson plans, an assessment strategy and an award-winning video to help educators implement the program—and what is even more compelling is that the curriculum meets the needs of the provincial curriculum in language and the arts.

The program's current distribution has the potential to reach over 290,000 students in Ontario alone. The program is now being tailored for use in Quebec and is available to other provinces across the country.

UIA Federations Canada salutes the Compers and applauds their vision and support of a diverse Canada. It is through initiatives such as these that we will help the next generation to develop respect and tolerance for difference.

Connecting with our Cuban brothers and sisters

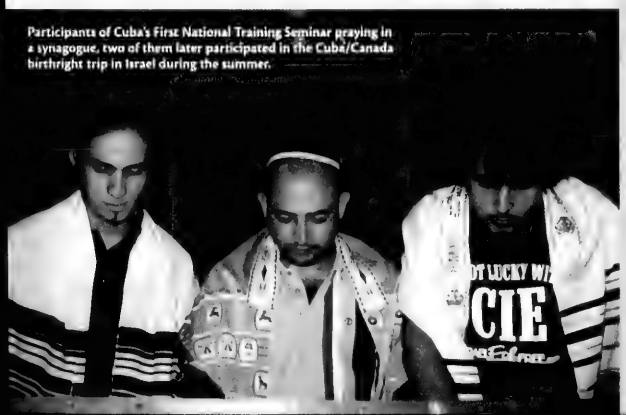
Canada and Cuba –who would have imagined that these 2 communities would have common interests and that they would develop meaningful relationships? The Canadian Jewish community has had, and continues to have a close and meaningful relationship with the Cuban Jewish community through partnerships established by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and more recently Canada Israel Experience (CIE), a department of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC).

For 45 years, the Jewish community of Ontario has helped nurture Jewish life for Cuba's 1,500 community members. Every year since the U.S. embargo on Cuba, the community has shipped kosher-for-Passover food and wine to Cuba's Jews, one of the last Diaspora communities in crisis. Over the past four years, CIE has also included Cuban participants on birthright israel trips, bringing together 30 Canadians, 10 Cubans and 10 Israelis for a 10 day mifgash. And more recently, UIAFC sponsored a leadership training program in Cuba in memory of Dr. Jose Miller z"l, longtime President of the Cuban Jewish community who passed away last winter.

November 30th, 2006 will mark the 100th anniversary of the Cuban Jewish community. Canadian Jewish representatives have been invited as guests for this important and historic milestone occasion. Stanley Plotnick, UIAFC president, will chair this small but special Mission to Cuba. Canadian delegates will show their support, learn more about this remarkable community and explore ways to build this partnership.

Mission participants will attend community celebrations, spend a Shabbat at the Patronato Synagogue in Havana, visit the city of Havana and meet with representatives of the community. We are most fortunate to have this opportunity to meet with our Cuban brothers and sisters and to further develop our unique relationship with the Cuban Jewish community. Helping Jews who live in difficult circumstances and are prevented from expressing their Judaism is one way in which we reinforce our support for World Jewry and our mission for Tikun Olam. By increasing their connection to other Jews and to Israel, we're helping them to fully express their Judaism.

We are proud to join in the celebration and we pledge to continue to stay connected and supportive for years to come.



Participants of Cuba's First National Training Seminar praying in a synagogue, two of them later participated in the Cuba/Canada birthright trip in Israel during the summer.

Transforming a Dream into Reality

Thrilled to be back in Canada on behalf of the Canadian Israel Emergency Campaigns, Fentahun Assefa-Dawit gave a stirring message of hope that he shared with audiences in Vancouver, Calgary, Ottawa, Halifax and Moncton. He spoke from experience when he said "The Ethiopians are an incredibly resilient people."

This past July, while serving as Director of an Absorption Centre in Israel's north, Fentahun calmly and quickly guided approximately 1,000 new Ethiopian immigrants to the Centre's 12 bomb shelters immediately upon hearing the warning siren.

His swift response saved lives, as the Centre took a direct hit from a Katyusha rocket. "We went through so much suffering in Ethiopia that for many of the people, this was a small price to pay for coming to Israel."

Fentahun Assefa-Dawit pictured with Micha Feldman, known as the "father of Ethiopian Jewry"

Ze'ev Bielski, chairman of the Jewish Agency, commented, "these brave people had a very, very hard beginning. They learned the word Katyusha. They learned the word miklat [shelter]. They understand what it means to be Israeli."

Like one of the hundreds of hopeful Ethiopians who arrive every month to fulfill their dream of reaching Israel, Fentahun has a remarkable story to relate. Born in a primitive Ethiopian village of 350 Jews, he walked across the desert as a teenager determined to reach the refugee camps in Sudan, and was offered asylum by the Canadian government.

While living in Canada, Fentahun became very active in Montreal's Jewish community, working closely with Ethiopian immigrants. His volunteer work included translating for the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) in Amharic and English. With a personal understanding and appreciation of the work of the Jewish Federation, he became an active volunteer of CJA's Super Sunday Telethon and became YHMA/YHWA Program Coordinator for Ethiopian Jews living in Montreal. As a student at Dawson College and Concordia University, he also took on an active role with Hillel.

But he and his family never gave up on their dream of living in Israel and after 7 1/2 years in Montreal, they immigrated to Israel. Through a Jewish Agency sponsored program, Fentahun graduated from the prestigious Technion Institute of Technology with an engineering degree.

Fentahun now serves as the Jewish Agency's Partnership 2000 Director to the Galilee Panhandle region and is consumed with the satisfaction of giving back to Israel. He is a shining example of how the Jewish federations provide hope, dignity and education, as well as helping Jews from around the world return home to Israel.

Shalom and warm greetings from Israel!

UIAFC has had a special partnership with Israel's northern communities for over 25 years, most recently through the Partnership 2000 initiative. Perhaps, because of this partnership, we reacted instantly and with impact, reinforcing our bond between Canada's Coast-to-Coast communities and Israel's Northern residents, while Montreal and Toronto's partnership regions (Eilat and Beer Sheva) hosted tens of thousands of northern residents seeking safe refuge from the north.

Across Canada, Jewish communities not only cared, but we felt the anxiety, were saddened by the losses, and concerned about the future. And we transformed our concern into reality by being the first country to launch an Israel Emergency Campaign. We can reflect back on our role with pride, knowing that our efforts were greatly appreciated by the people of Israel, particularly in the north, and the leadership of Keren Hayesod and the Jewish Agency.

We were even blessed to have Prime Minister Harper's immediate support of Israel's right to protect itself and are so very grateful and proud of his courageous, unwavering leadership.

Canada's commitment to a safe and secure Israel would not have spoken so loudly to the world without the dedicated support of each and every one of us. Over the summer we indeed learned that the sum of our united efforts is much greater than its parts.

But our job has just started. Having provided an immediate response to Israel's immediate needs, we now face the challenge of her long-term needs. The strength of Israel will be determined by the success and development of Israel's peripheral communities. We must help Israel transform the devastation into opportunity and help build a stronger and more secure future.

With the displacement of 400,000 residents over the summer, the disruption of an estimated 90,000 businesses, and the 20% decline in college enrollment, anxious residents of the north are considering their options for the future. They must be assured of security and preparedness for any future attacks. They must have the ability to live quality lives with economic and educational opportunities similar to other regions. And we must do our share to help them achieve these goals, while continuing our proud partnership with the people and State of Israel.

Stanley Plotnick, President, UIA Federations Canada

Canada backs Israel in UN votes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada joined seven other members of the UN Human Rights Council last week to oppose a resolution condemning Israel for its artillery strike on Beit Hanoun that killed 19 Palestinians but ignoring the repeated Qassam rocket launches that prompted the retaliatory barrage.

Opposes Human Rights Council vote, abstains in General Assembly

Please see editorial on page 8 and related story on page 37

In New York, meanwhile, Canada abstained on a General Assembly resolution – one of 20 on the Middle East being advanced by Arab and Muslim countries – that called for the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination.

And late last week, Louise Arbour, the newly installed United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, began a tour of Israel and the Palestinian Authority after the General Assembly deplored Israel's attack. She is expected to draft a report to be submitted to the General Assembly. On Sunday, she visited Beit Hanoun where she said the Palestinian territories have suffered "massive" violations of human rights during violence between Palestinians and the Israeli military.

The Human Rights Council met in Geneva in a special session called to deal with the Gaza flareup. It was the third special session held by the council since it was launched in June.

The council's resolution expressed the "shock and horror of Israeli killing of Palestinian civilians in Beit Hanoun" and "alarm at the gross and systematic violations of human rights of the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territory by the occupying power, Israel."

The resolution was silent about Palestinian attacks on Israel and protecting Israeli civilians.

Hillel Neuer

However, it "urges all concerned parties to respect the rules of international humanitarian law, to refrain from violence against civilian population."

'One of the safest places in Israel'

CJN reporter tours Golan Heights

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

GOLAN HEIGHTS, ISRAEL — Gazing out over Syria from a bunker used in Israel's 1973 Yom Kippur War, I heard an electronic beep from the depths of my overstuffed purse.

When my small group of North American Jewish journalists re-emerged into the sunlight and chill morning air at the top of Mount Bental, a dormant volcano in Israel's Golan Heights, I pulled out the cellphone I'd brought from home and found a new text message: "Welcome to Syria! Access voicemail as u do at home…"

My phone had picked up a signal from a nearby Syrian carrier, offering a pointed lesson about the proximity of Israel to its Arab neighbour and the reason we hear so much about the Golan's strategic importance.

In counterpoint to more serious issues, however, we saw a chameleon change colour as it darted between whimsical sculptures bordering the path that leads to the bunker, and we were amused by the cleverly named "Coffee Anan" coffee shop, a reference both to the secretary general of the United Nations and the height of the volcano (the word "anan" means "cloud" in Hebrew).

Despite its location cheek by jowl with the border, and despite the approximately 200 Katyushas that fell there during this summer's war with Hezbollah, the Golan, which was controlled by Syria from 1947 to 1967, is considered "one of the safest places in Israel," according to Israel Eshed, CEO of Golan Tourism (www.etour.golan.org.il).

The sparsely populated 1,158-square-kilometre region, with about 20,000 Jewish and 20,000 Druze residents, is the subject of a multi-sensory IMAX-like short movie, Kesem HaGolan (The Magic of the Golan), produced for visitors. It can be seen in the same complex that houses Eshed's office in Katzrin, the Golan's main town.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Compers Get Degree

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of Haifa University hosted a tribute dinner in Toronto on Sunday for BMO Financial Group CEO Tony Comper and his wife Elizabeth, who were awarded honorary doctorates from the university for their efforts to fight anti-Semitism. Earlier this year, the Compers founded FAST – Fighting Anti-Semitism Together – which aims to mobilize business leaders against anti-Semitism. Proceeds from the dinner will go to the university's new Elizabeth and Tony Comper Interdisciplinary Institute for the Study of Anti-semitism and Racism.

CEO Receives Award

MONTREAL — E. Hunter Harrison, president and CEO of CN, was presented with B'nai Brith Canada's Award of Merit at a gala evening at Montreal's Windsor Station last week attended by close to 800 guests. The fundraiser was co-chaired by two past honorees: Paul Tellier, whom Harrison succeeded at CN, and Michael Sabia, president and CEO of Bell Canada Enterprises, and former second-in-command to Tellier when he headed CN. Tellier and Sabia are past Award of Merit recipients.

Trust Fund Set Up

MONTREAL — A trust fund has been set up to help Dawson College shooting victim Leslie Markofsky, 23, who was shot twice in the head in the Sept. 13 attack. The friends of Markofsky's father who launched the fund, which has raised $7,500 so far, said it would go to help Markofsky in his ongoing rehabilitation. He was released from hospital earlier this month and is expected to make a full recovery. The fund can be e-mailed at kcraigster@gmail.com. Its website is www.geocities.com/lesliefunds.

WORLD

Milton Friedman Dies

SAN FRANCISCO — Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, 94, died Nov. 16 in San Francisco of heart failure. Born in New York City to immigrants from what's now Ukraine, he was the youngest of four children. He developed some of his early economic theories while working for U.S. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal. Friedman helped found the Chicago school of economics, which believed government should have a reduced role in the economy, outside of regulating the monetary supply to control inflation. He won the Nobel Prize for economics in 1976.

Tree To Be Felled

AMSTERDAM — A chestnut tree mentioned as a source of comfort and hope in Anne Frank's diary is going to be cut down. The 150-year-old tree stood in the courtyard of the Amsterdam house where Frank's family hid for more than two years during the Nazi occupation. The city said last week that the tree has deteriorated badly due to a fungus and must be felled. In her diary, the Jewish teen described the tree several times, including once in February 1944: "From my favourite spot on the floor I look up at the blue sky and the bare chestnut tree, on whose branches little raindrops shine, appearing like silver, and at the seagulls and other birds as they glide on the wind… As long as this exists, I thought, and I may live to see it… I cannot be unhappy." Frank's family was later discovered and she died in Bergen-Belsen in 1945.

Iran Seeks Arrests

TEHRAN — Iran's attorney general called for the arrest of Argentine officials in response to arrest warrants issued in the AMIA bombing case. Tehran's chief prosecutor was asked to issue warrants for Juan Jose Galeano, the former prosecutor in the AMIA case, "and his accomplices." The request was in response to Argentina's decision to seek the arrest of ex-Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, six other former Iranian officials and one Hezbollah operative in connection with the 1994 bombing of Buenos Aires' AMIA Jewish centre, which killed 85 people and wounded 300. Galeano was fired from the case after an investigation found he bribed a defendant to change his testimony.

B'nai Brith Asks Ottawa to Expel Ex-Nazis

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada asked Ottawa to revoke the citizenship of four men who lied about their Nazi pasts to gain admission into Canada in the 1950s.

Canada's war crimes unit in the Department of Justice has determined that there is compelling evidence linking the men to crimes against humanity.

They are Helmut Oberlander, a former Einsatzgruppen interpreter; Vladimir Katriuk, former member of a German battalion that committed atrocities against civilians; Wasyl Odynsky, alleged to have been a guard at the Poniatowa labour camp in Poland; and Jacob Fast, who worked in a political section of the Nazi auxiliary police in Ukraine.

David Matas, B'nai Brith's senior legal counsel, met with Citizenship and Immigration Minister Monte Solberg recently to urge that their citizenship be revoked immediately.

Jewish newcomers, veterans elected to councils

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Toronto-area residents went to the polls last week to vote for city councillors and school trustees, and while some decided on grizzled veterans and others voted for new blood, scattered among the candidates were various Jewish politicians.

In Toronto, high-profile councillor Harold Moscoe retained his seat in Eglinton-Lawrence (Ward 15), winning 47 per cent of the vote.

Moscoe, the bombastic chair of the Toronto Transit Commission, wasted little time getting down to work after the election, pushing the issue of terrorism on the TTC.

"If somebody wants to blow themselves up on a subway train, nobody's going to be able to stop them," Moscoe told the Toronto Star on Nov. 15 in comments about increased federal security funding for transits. (The CJN's calls to Moscoe were not returned.)

Elsewhere, David Shiner was returned to office in Willowdale (Ward 24) with 54 per cent of the vote.

Shiner has served on city council since 1991 and will continue to advocate for better transit funding and expansion of Toronto's transit system, his website stated.

In York Centre (Ward 10), Deputy Mayor Michael Feldman won re-election, beating his closest rival, Igor Toutchinski, by more than 4,500 votes.

Feldman, whose ward is almost 30 per cent Jewish, hopes to fix recurring flood zones on streets in his ward, as well as continuing his advocacy for affordable housing and fighting a proposed townhouse development at Wilmington Avenue and Overbrook Place.

"I want to preserve the Wilmington plaza," Feldman said. "There are lots of young shul-going families coming back [to the Bathurst Manor area] and I think there's room for successful kosher stores there."

North of the city, Alan Shefman won re-election in a tight race in Vaughan (Ward 5), defeating Bernie Green by just 212 votes.

Shefman's campaign stressed environmental issues such as recycling and garbage collection.

CUPE endorsement angers trustee

Josh Matlow, returning school trustee for St. Paul's (Ward 11), is upset with CUPE Ontario for backing him in the recent municipal vote.

Despite his jubilation about being re-elected last week, Matlow said he won't forget how the labour union's unsolicited endorsement of his campaign just prior to election day led to a smear campaign against him.

That's because the union's support led Jewish constituents to link him with CUPE Ontario's May resolution to boycott Israel, he said.

"I don't accept any union or corporate donations at all," Matlow said. "But the very fact that they unilaterally endorsed me caused [people] to say I'm anti-Israel... and it went around the Jewish community."

As a result, Matlow said that one of his first orders of business in this new term will be to take CUPE Ontario to task over its stance on Israel.

"I'm a Jew, so I'm aware," he said. "We have CUPE workers in our schools... we need to make clear to them that we don't support this backwards resolution."

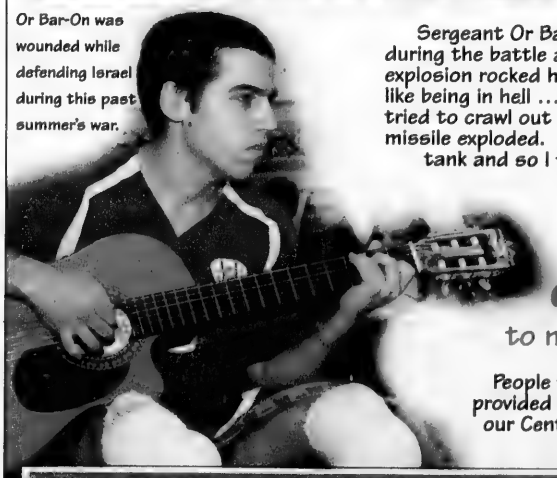
Matlow plans to raise the issue with the school board early in the new year.

In January, he plans to speak with colleagues and educate them about why he thinks CUPE Ontario's stance is unfair and inappropriate.

And he'll be sure to address the Jewish community directly as well.

"We need to send a message... that we don't support this type of nonsense," Matlow said. "I think [CUPE] should stay out of international politics and stick to working in our schools." —A.L.-A.

It was like being in hell ... my legs seemed to be gone.



Or Bar-On was wounded while defending Israel during this past summer's war.

Sergeant Or Bar-On, 20, was afraid of dying when a missile hit his tank on July 20, 2006, during the battle at Maroun al-Ras in Lebanon. Or describes that fateful morning when an explosion rocked his tank: "I felt a kind of searing pain that I wouldn't wish on anyone. It was like being in hell ... I saw that my legs had been hurt, the lower part seemed to be gone. I tried to crawl out of my tank using only my hands. I got as far as the turret when another missile exploded. I felt as if I had been wounded for a second time. I couldn't hold onto the tank and so I fell. After 3½ hours, I was evacuated and taken to the hospital."

In the intensive care unit, the doctors said that Or had lost an enormous amount of blood. He was hanging between life and death. A combat fighter, Or miraculously survived but unfortunately lost both his legs.

"Now I start my life anew because it has been given to me as a gift. I won't take anything for granted."

People from Beit Halochem Israel visited Or in the hospital regularly. He was provided with a laptop and MP4 player, taken out for social excursions and visits to our Centres, where he was shown that there is hope for him and others like him. Or was given the moral support and information needed to deal with his new disability.

With your help, we are committed to funding therapeutic devices and specialized equipment, physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, sport coaching and cultural activities in our 4 Centres.

This summer too many Israeli soldiers died and 750 were wounded. Beit Halochem Israel has already welcomed 350 who are facing a long and difficult rehabilitation.

The disbelief to come

From the editor's desk

In 100 years, or less, when future, honest historians try to understand the decisions taken by western leaders in the first decade of the 21st century, they will undoubtedly be perplexed. They will wonder quizzically and likely struggle to grasp how the upbeat sense of optimism that accompanied the turn of the new millennium disappeared so quickly.

And they will undoubtedly shake their heads with profound disbelief and sigh with unmasked, fatiguing sadness at the craven, cynical men and women who purported to lead the western world against fanatic, genocidal, anti-western, enemy forces arrayed so openly and murderously against the them.

The notes for the first draft of the history of the beginning of the 21st century could have the following entries.

• It was unbelievable that some 60 years after the gates of Auschwitz were thrown open for all the world to see and witness, there arose a government in a large, powerful country – Iran – that set as a high priority of its foreign policy, a campaign to dissuade the world that Auschwitz had ever happened.

• It was unbelievable that the oil-rich government of Iran, a country awash with hundreds of years of natural gas and petroleum reserves, at first covertly by stealth and wile, and then openly, neither embarrassed nor ashamed, pursued the building of its own nuclear bombs.

• It was unbelievable that the same government of Iran sent out its army of terrorists throughout the world to destabilize and destroy. In Argentina, they slaughtered Jews. In Iraq, Syria, Somalia, Lebanon, Gaza and the West Bank, they underwrote, fomented, trained and taught terrorism.

• It was unbelievable that the same government of Iran openly propagated in front of large gatherings of Iranian legislators and large gatherings of other nations the annihilation of a fellow sovereign state – Israel.

• It was unbelievable that the same government of Iran hectored the leaders of Europe about their responsibility for the original sin of the establishment of the Jewish state in the Muslim Middle East.

• It was unbelievable that rather than isolate the leader of this very same government of Iran and demonstrate to him that neither he nor his call to genocide were welcome in a civilized world, he was actually invited to the highest rostrum of the United Nations General Assembly to bask in the prestige of the place and the occasion.

• It was unbelievable that the leaders of the West did not foresee the horrific danger inherent to the entire world in the possibility of the government of Iran possessing nuclear weapons to use in pursuit of its ominously eschatological theocratic political aims, or as a supplier to rogue terrorist groups.

• It was unbelievable that rather than act concertedly and collectively to forfend the Iranian government's acquisition of nuclear weapons, western leaders equivocated and cavilled, and that the leaders of Russia and of China were Iran's main prospectors.

• It was unbelievable that the leaders of the West did not see the danger to their own countries by Iranian mischief-making and intervention throughout the Middle East and thus try to prevent Iran from, for example, carrying out anti-Israel and anti-western aims in south Lebanon, Gaza and the West Bank.

• It was unbelievable that the leaders of the West simply acquiesced as the UN in all its various debating venues, fora and committees merely became a brazen propaganda instrument in the well-plotted, devious and demonic campaign to destroy the sovereign Jewish State of Israel.

• It was unbelievable that the UN constantly, falsely, unfairly, obsessively, unjustifiably condemned Israel.

• It was unbelievable that the western world not only allowed but with the involvement of many European governments, was actually complicit in leading the UN to its final disgrace and ultimate demise into irrelevance and oblivion.

• It was unbelievable that, deluded by his ignorance and fanatic religious views, the leader of the government of Iran did not understand that the people of Israel would defend themselves against him and his demented plotting.

• It was unbelievable that western leaders, primarily in Europe, preferred to curry favour with Iran rather than to support Israel.

• It was unbelievable that the western world, too, did not understand the profound loyalty of the people and the government of Israel to the ancient Jewish prophet's declaration: "We shall not die, but live."

• It was unbelievable that the western world did not sufficiently heed the warning of the government of Israel that it would not rely on mere pronouncements of support against an enemy that had declared its intention to annihilate the Jewish state; that it would rely, ultimately, on itself to keep the solemn promise made years before to God, history and the Jewish people: "never again."

• It was unbelievable that the western leaders, especially in Europe, paid so little attention to their own history.

But these reflections are only possible entries in a future record of the 21st century. The book has not yet been written.

Israeli leaders not up to Iranian threat: analyst

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel faces an existential threat from Iran at a moment when its leaders have never been so incompetent, an Israeli analyst has warned.

Blasting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz for turning in mediocre performances during last summer's war in Lebanon, Yossi Klein Halevi said Israel has never faced such a severe leadership crisis.

Yossi Klein Halevi

In addition, Klein Halevi said the Palestinians have squandered an opportunity for statehood and that, for the foreseeable future, Israel must sit tight in the West Bank.

Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center – a conservative think tank in Jerusalem – and the Israel correspondent for the New Republic, delivered this gloomy assessment at Holy Blossom Temple last week. Here on the last leg of a North American tour, he spoke under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canada-Israel Committee.

In a reference to Israel's recent war with Hezbollah in Lebanon – which he called "the worst assault" on Israel since the 1948 war – he said that no Israeli government ever went to war with a better hand.

The country was united, the United States was fully behind Israel, and Israelis were willing to make substantial sacrifices for a victory, he said.

Yet the government had no clear battle plan, he charged. "We weren't prepared to fight this war."

Taking particular aim at Peretz, Klein Halevi scathingly described him as a minister lacking in both experience and knowledge who should never have been appointed to such a vital position. Yet, for short-term partisan political reasons, Olmert handed him the sensitive defence portfolio.

Recalling that the 34-day war ended with a massive Hezbollah rocket barrage into Israel, Klein Halevi said, "This is the first war Israel lost."

Calling it a "disastrous" exercise, Klein Halevi said that Israel failed to convey a message of deterrence to the Arabs. Given its results, Olmert and Peretz should have assumed responsibility for its outcome and promptly resigned.

Klein Halevi said Israel's political system is weighed down by "a culture of expediency" where "cutting corners" is the norm and where ethical shortcomings are common.

Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, best symbolizes the malaise, he said.

Katsav, accused of sexual misconduct, should resign or temporarily leave office until the case is settled. Yet he stubbornly clings to power, making Israel "a laughingstock" in the eyes of the world.

But Klein Halevi isn't totally pessimistic. He expects new leadership to emerge and navigate Israel through "this terrible time."

Klein Halevi said Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal will force Israel to act militarily, since countries such as Russia and China oppose economic sanctions against Tehran.

Claiming that Iran is seriously contemplating a nuclear strike against Israel, Klein Halevi asserted that the spectre of the Holocaust hangs over Israel for the first time in its history.

"This is 1938," he said apocalyptically, equating Iran's hostility to Israel with Nazi Germany's preparations for war.

Predicting that Israel's standoff with Iran will reach a climax within months, Klein Halevi noted that senior Israeli officials recognize the gravity of the problem.

He referred to a recent statement by Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh in which he declared that Iran's acquisition of an atomic bomb would touch off a flight of Israelis from Israel and call into question its very existence.

"I think he's absolutely right," Klein Halevi said.

Recalling that the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin tried to resolve Israel's dispute with the Palestinians so that Israel could focus its energies on the looming threat from Iran, Klein Halevi said Olmert's plan for a unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank has imploded.

If Israel cedes the West Bank, Palestinian militants there will emulate their counterparts in the Gaza Strip and fire rockets into Israeli towns and cities on the coastal plain, he said.

Israel should recognize that an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza is no longer a viable option.

Charging that the Palestinians have lost the trust of Israelis, Klein Halevi claimed that the current generation of Palestinian leaders are "more committed to our destruction than their own betterment."

The Palestinians could have used Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005 as a chance to improve the lives of their people and set the stage for a Palestinian state.

Instead, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas tolerates the firing of Qassam rockets launched from Gaza and hopes that final status talks will destabilize Israel by forcing the "right of return" down its throat.

Klein Halevi said the current Hamas government, far from desiring a Palestinian state, wants to resurrect an Islamic caliphate in the Middle East.

Since a two-state solution seems far off, he added, Israel should maintain the status quo in the West Bank and forget about a withdrawal.

Besides, he noted, Israel has "profound strategic interests" in the West Bank, as well as historical and religious claims to it.

Nonetheless, the West Bank should be put on the negotiating table once a new Palestinian leadership comes to the fore, he said. In the meantime, Israel should consider the concept of shared rule with Jordan in the West Bank.

Klein Halevi said Israel has reached the point where it can't afford to live under illusions. Yet he believes there are rays of hope on the horizon.

On the heels of the war in Lebanon, Sunni Arab states, such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, now realize that the Shiite bloc is a greater threat than Israel, he said.

As well, just as Nazism and Communism were defeated, so, too, will the forces of Islamic radicalism, he said without elaborating.

Group promotes co-ordinated tzedakah effort

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In 2000, dentist Brian Price implemented his vision to help Jewish charitable groups network with each other.

Last week, he invited the public talk directly to the groups and see who they are.

Price founded United Chesed of Toronto as an umbrella body for all the Jewish aid organizations in the Toronto area that serve impoverished Jews, regardless of their affiliation.

"We work with the individual, not with the ideology," Price explained.

For the last six years, the non-profit United Chesed has helped hundreds get food, jobs, clothing, furniture and all manner of assistance, either directly or indirectly, through its one-stop referral service.

And the need continues to grow.

So much so, that on Nov. 12 at the North York Civic Centre, Price and his team organized their first public community awareness symposium and networking event.

"So many people have called for our help, this is one way we could reach many people in one evening," said Lisa Aharon, United Chesed's director and treasurer.

The event was designed to raise awareness in the community about the many organizations available to those in need.

Addressing the assembled crowd, Price made an impassioned plea to the community to support those "who have fallen through the cracks in the system."

He added: "United Chesed will continue to make a difference for those in need."

Keynote speaker Paul Godfrey, president and CEO of the Toronto Blue Jays, noted how United Chesed impressed him with its mandate to unify Jewish charities and educate the community.

"The perception is that the Jewish community is wealthy," he said. "But below the radar there are approximately 15,000 [people] who live in poverty. So it is incumbent upon us that we reach each one of them."

In a moment of digression, Godfrey told the audience that he had personally congratulated Prime Minister Stephen Harper on his principled stance on Israel during the recent war with Hezbollah.

The comment drew applause from the mostly Jewish crowd.

After the speeches, the crowd was urged to visit "networking rooms" that hosted tables from participating Jewish charities.

Crowd members spoke with representatives of organizations such as L'Chaim cancer support for Jewish women; CHAI TIKVAH Foundation, a provider of support services for psychiatrically disabled Jewish adults; JACS and the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Casa, among others.

"It's important to tell people we exist and show what we are doing," said Daniel Kestelman, a relief staffer for CHAI TIKVAH.

United Chesed of Toronto, which is funded by private donations, is the "closest example of Jewish unity in the world today" and organizations can affiliate with it for free, one of the pamphlets handed out to attendees stated.

"This is a great forum for the community, and [we] hope people come in and find the help they need," Aharon said of the symposium.

The group meets approximately once every six weeks to share information and dialogue with its 70-plus member organizations.

Withdraw from the UNHRC

Once again, Israel's enemies mobilized their large, automatic majorities in the United Nations to register propaganda "victories" in the multi-front war they are waging against the Jewish state. Lopsided condemnations of Israel rang in the impressive, wood-panelled halls of the Human Rights Council (UNHRC) in Geneva and the General Assembly in New York. But for the veto of the United States, the Security Council too would have condemned Israel.

The condemnations were in relation to the deaths of 19 Palestinian civilians in Beit Hanoun on Nov. 8. The deaths were horrible and deplorable. But they were accidental, unintended results of the wholly justified efforts by the Israel Defence Forces to stop the barrage of Qassam rockets being fired at the people of Israel by Hamas' appointed terrorists. The IDF and the prime minister of Israel expressed profound regret for the 19 deaths.

The UNHRC condemned Israel for the "willful killing" of Palestinian civilians by a vote of 32 in favour, eight opposed and six abstentions. (Canada opposed the resolution.) Not a single word appeared in the resolution about the deliberate targeting of Israeli civilians by Palestinians. Indeed, on the very day of the vote, Faina Slutsky died in Sderot in a hail of Qassam rockets fired from Gaza.

Four days later, the General Assembly condemned Israel for the same incident by a vote of 156 in favour, seven opposed and six abstentions and called for a team to be sent to the area to conduct an inquiry into the deaths of the 19 Palestinians. (Canada abstained.)

The assembly did not condemn Hamas or any other Palestinians. Yet they have unceasingly sent rockets into Israel from Gaza ever since the Israeli army withdrew from there some 15 months ago.

The hypocrisy, blatant injustice and utter absurdity of such condemnation are destroying the United Nations. The hopes that were pinned on the organization in the aftermath of World War II have died. But some leaders in the West are beginning to raise their voices in bitter but principled protest. Thus, after the UNHRC vote, Ottawa's Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, co-chaired by Anita Neville and Senator David Smith, called on Canada to withdraw from the UNHRC.

"Trying to work from within to correct a broken system has not worked and has made Canada seem to be a willing participant in this charade of a process. The time for serious UN reform is now, and in order to prove to the international community how committed Canada is to this reform, it is imperative that the Conservative government withdraw from the UNHRC until serious, legitimate, and viable reform is done at the United Nations and its human rights council," Smith said.

We urge the government to adopt this recommendation. Canada should no longer lend its credit to patently unjust, unfair and discriminatory processes. Canada should withdraw from the UNHRC.

Israel renewed its call for a nuclear-free zone in the Middle East, to be attained through negotiations by states in the region. Yehuda Blum, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, made the statement during a UN General Assembly debate about Israel's June 1981 attack on Iraq's nuclear facility.

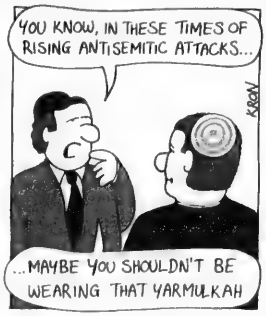
Cheap shot at Chabad

The review of The Challenge of Creation, by Rabbi Nathan Slifkin, lavishly applauded by Paul Shaviv, begins with a cheap shot at Chabad ("In the beginning: science, Genesis and the wondering Jew," perspectives, CJN, Nov. 9). He states that back in the mid-1960s, only Chabad subscribed to the notion that claimed "the world was exactly five-thousand-and-some years old. But no one I knew – including several Orthodox rabbis – took them seriously. It was an exotic sideshow to the Chabad 'gig.'"



Please note, the position of Chabad is not a sectarian issue but rather the stated opinion of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the Lubavitcher Rebbe of blessed memory, who wrote a number of letters on the subject in response to inquiries received from scientists and physicists. He explained his position at length based on logic, and faith. His position is not and never was a Lubavitch "sideshow."

In fact, the writer continues to identify this position as common among the Orthodox. Thus he defends Rabbi Slifkin against an onslaught of conventional scholars who found his words "unfashionable," and later acknowledges that he speaks for a "small group of Orthodox who yearn to hear voices in Orthodoxy to whom we can relate."

He concludes his essay by admonishing others for being crude and mud-slingers in desperate need to learn derech eretz!

All this leaves me confused and amused.

Agunot conference cancellation

The recent decision taken by the Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel to cancel the recent rabbinic conference concerning agunot is extremely unfortunate ("Women's leaders outraged as agunot meet cancelled," CJN, Nov. 9). While one can have no illusions that instant halachic solutions can be found to ameliorate the plight of the agunah, the very fact that such a conference could be called would send a strong message to the Jewish community that the Orthodox rabbinate cares deeply about the agunah's situation.

In light of the recent decision of the Quebec Court of Appeals to further limit women's rights in divorce proceedings, it becomes imperative for the Orthodox community to tackle the dilemma of the agunah. Rather than consider the conference to have been some type of accession to feminists, the conference would have served as a sign to the community at large that the agunah is not being ignored.

An opportunity was lost with the cancellation of this conference. Instead, as a result of this cancellation, a chilul HaShem was created. The cancellation of this conference led to further disparagement of the Orthodox rabbinate, and by extension, the halachic fabric of our faith.

While one can justifiably point to the efforts of the Rabbinical Council of America to help solve the agunah crisis with its pre-nuptial agreements, and to the actions of individual rabbis and congregations to boycott and ostracize recalcitrant spouses, one still hopes that the universal Orthodox rabbinate could see its way to meet together under the auspices of the chief rabbinate of Israel to create a united front in addressing the agunah problem.

Heroes to the Jewish people

My deepest appreciation and sympathy to Israeli army officer Noam Arbel on his moving article ("A soldier's personal Yizkor," CJN, Oct. 19) and to the surviving family members of Alex Bonimovitch, Uri Grossman, Bnaya Rein, Adam Goren, Yonatan Sharabi, Shai Bernstein, Lotan Slavin and Yaniv Temerson. Each and every one was a hero to whom the Jewish people owes a huge debt of gratitude.

BJCC will lose members

I would like to express my disappointment after reading that the existing Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) will have to be torn down before the new one is built ("New BJCC to be built on current site," CJN, Nov. 9). Does the development committee expect all of the present members to find alternative facilities and then return en masse to the new building?

We men in the health club feel that their membership should not be interrupted, and once they go to another club they will never return. In addition, eliminating squash and racquetball courts and reducing tennis facilities to just one court will surely chase those who play racquet sports to other clubs (for good).

The development committee should look back at the 1950s when the Bloor Street YMHA attracted many teenage Jews as a meeting place, and they continued their membership because of the social aspect initiated and led by Sonny Langer and Max Cohen. We continued into sports, art, etc.

I would suggest that those on the development committee go out to the membership and measure the pros and cons more carefully before making those snap decisions and losing the majority of members who love the "Y."

Abba Olmert goes to Washington

By MICHAEL B. OREN

> As in 1967, the U.S. may leave Israel on its own to solve a threat to its existence

"Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." With these words, former U.S. president Lyndon B. Johnson greeted then Israeli foreign minister Abba Eban at the White House on May 26, 1967. The Middle East was in the throes of an escalating crisis. Gamal Abdel Nasser had evicted UN peacekeepers from Egypt's border with Israel, blockaded the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping, and called on the Arab world to "throw the Jews into the sea." Israel had no intention of waiting to see if Nasser would carry out his pledge, or of keeping its troops on the permanent state of alert that was bankrupting the country.

And so the Israeli government sent its foreign minister to seek Johnson's approval for mounting a pre-emptive strike. But LBJ only disappointed Eban. Though hostile to Nasser and firmly supportive of Israel, the president was hamstrung by America's imbroglio in Vietnam and by the drop in his domestic support. The most he offered the Israelis was Washington's help in mobilizing international action against Egypt. Beyond that, there was only that repeated, cryptic phrase, "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone."

Perhaps a similar message was imparted by U.S. President George W. Bush in his meeting earlier this week with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Much like 1967, Israel faces a Middle Eastern leader who has repeatedly sworn to wipe it off the map, and to that end is assiduously trying to acquire nuclear weapons. Like Nasser, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad can cripple Israel economically by keeping it in a state of alert, driving away foreign investment and tourism. In the absence of international commitment to thwart Iran's nuclear plans, Israel has no choice but to consider striking pre-emptively. Doing so, however, requires explicit U.S. support, or at the very least, an indication that the United States will not oppose such action. Like Eban 40 years earlier, Olmert came to Washington in search of a green light.

But the United States is hardly in the position to sanction an Israeli attack. Bogged down in Iraq and hemorrhaging political capital at home, Bush resembles Johnson in his inability to approve risky military initiatives. As inimical to Ahmadinejad as his predecessor was to Nasser, and at least as sympathetic to the Jewish state, Bush is nevertheless unable to undertake a unilateral attack against Iran or even to endorse an Israeli one.

This was bad news for Olmert. The Israeli prime minister hoped to secure a hard-and-fast timetable for interdicting Iran's nuclear program first by diplomacy and then, if that failed, by force. Instead, he heard that the United States would only support measures to isolate Iran economically and balked at the use of bombs. Though he and his administration have routinely stated a determination to prevent Iran from obtaining strategic capabilities, Bush, in the aftermath of his party's electoral defeats, avoided all public mention of armed power as a means of achieving that goal.

The only option for the United States, then, is international sanctions. These, however, have proven singularly inadequate in quashing the nuclear aspirations of North Korea – a country far more financially fragile than Iran – and lack the vital support of Russia, China and France. Iran has also threatened to retaliate for sanctions by cutting back oil production and increasing its support for terror.

Back in 1967, Johnson also tried to apply international pressure on Egypt. He planned to issue a multilateral declaration condemning the closure of Tiran and to create a convoy of ships from 26 nations to physically challenge the blockade. But fearing for their oil supplies, European countries refused to co-operate with Johnson's démarche, while Egypt threatened violence against any attempt to reopen the straits. In the end, only four countries were willing to sign the declaration and only two volunteered ships for the convoy.

Bush is unlikely to be more successful than Johnson in marshalling international strictures against a defiant Middle Eastern regime. Nor was Olmert liable to extract from Bush more concrete backing for pre-emptive action than Eban did from LBJ. At most, Bush could have signalled his sympathy for Israel's plight and for the steps it must take to ensure its survival. The light Olmert received in Washington was probably not green, but neither was it flashing red.

Eban left the White House disappointed and confused. Neither he nor the Israeli government could decipher the meaning of the message "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." Was the president opposed to an assault against Egypt, as some of the ministers believed, or was he indicating his willingness to look the other way while Israel attacked? Ultimately, Israeli leaders concluded that, while the United States might condemn the action, it would probably do nothing to stop it. Johnson, for his part, understood that the Israelis had lost faith in international diplomacy and would interpret his words as a go. "They're going to hit," the president sighed, "and there's nothing we can do about it."

Lyndon Johnson indeed did little to prevent Israel from launching its surprise attack against Egypt on June 5 or, after Jordan and Syria joined the war, from advancing into the West Bank and the Golan Heights. The Six-Day War was a seismic event that profoundly altered the Middle East, with reverberations that continue to convulse the region. An Israeli strike at Iran's nuclear facilities could well have a similar impact, especially as Ahmadinejad and the mullahs are certain to react violently.

Olmert and his government must consider such consequences as they decide on Israel's next moves. The ramifications of that decision are certain to affect America as well. Many Arabs to this day believe that the United States was complicit in the Six-Day War, and even that American pilots flew Israeli planes. Such rumours will again be rife if Israel attacks Iran, and especially if Israeli jets pass through Iraq's American-controlled airspace. Israel may indeed act alone, but in the minds of a great many people in the Middle East, the United States acts with it.

Opinions

In the style of the prophets

Paraphrasing a thrice-repeated sentence in the Book of Judges, David Grossman, the distinguished Israeli novelist, speaking at the rally commemorating the yahrzeit of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, lamented that "this time there is no king in Israel." He was referring to the lack of political leadership in the Jewish state.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

"I am totally secular," he said, "and yet in my eyes the establishment and the very existence of the State of Israel is a miracle of sorts that happened to us as a nation – a political, national, human miracle."

There are, of course, also religious ways to reflect on the miracle. My own speculation suggests that God took a calculated risk. Because of the intensified persecution and extermination of the Jews brought about by modernity, God decided to suspend the verdict, so often articulated in our traditional sources, that we have been exiled because of our sins. God would grant us conditional parole and allow us to return to our land in the hope that this time we would prove ourselves worthy of the gift.

But Grossman believes that we are in danger of squandering that gift, because "people leading Israel today are unable to connect Israelis to their identity." Rabin, on the other hand, "decided to act, because he discerned very wisely that Israeli society would not be able to sustain itself endlessly in a state of an unresolved conflict," and he "realized long before many others that life in a climate of violence, occupation, terror, anxiety and hopelessness extracts a price Israel cannot afford."

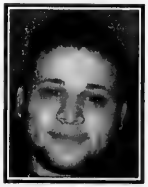
In the style of the Prophets, Grossman urges us to look at ourselves before identifying the sins of our enemies. He blames the current Israeli leadership for being indifferent to the failure of the peace process, for the harsh blow to democracy "by taking Avigdor Lieberman into the cabinet, for neglecting the poor, the foreign workers and minorities. I read these charges as sins that may bring us once again into exile. For, as the ancient texts have it, it was because of our sins that we were driven out from our land."

Anticipating the criticism, which came fast and furious, that his was a rant of a grieving father upon the loss of a son (in Israel's last war), Grossman said: "The calamity that struck my family and myself with the falling of our son, Uri, does not grant me any additional rights in the public discourse, but I believe that the experience of facing death and the loss brings with it sobriety and lucidity."

Though it's more comforting to dismiss Grossman's charges by listening to his critics, we owe it to ourselves, instead, to learn from the truths of his sobriety, lucidity and pain.

Let's get smart about Israel advocacy

Earlier this month I attended a lecture by Neil Lazarus on Israel advocacy. For anyone who has not heard of him before, Lazarus is an internationally acclaimed speaker who has worked with many Israeli and Jewish organizations and has built an impressive resume of clients and admirers around the globe.



Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

The seminar was informative and helpful, but it was also fun. Content aside, Lazarus is an engaging and charismatic speaker who peppered his speech with amusing personal anecdotes about his family and past experiences, and he used games to emphasize his ideas. He is an entertainer with a message, one that he makes sure to convey, even going so far as to quiz the audience near the end of the talk.

The most important part of his seminar was not about what to argue when it comes to Israel advocacy (although he did outline several lines of reasoning) but how to make the argument for Israel.

Most people, he says, don't know and don't really care about the Middle East. Their opinions are formed through 15-second news broadcasts and buzzwords.

Thus, the most important thing, I realized, is that trying to convince the other person is not the point of arguing about the Middle East. The issues have been so over-debated that once someone has made up his or her mind and is involved enough with the issues to argue with someone else about them, you're not going to change their views, regardless of how profound your points are. Instead, the debate is important only as a tool in convincing those watching the discussion who have no definite opinion.

Lazarus shows how Israel has been losing an important war – the war over international public opinion. For instance, no uninvolved person would say that he or she agrees with an "apartheid wall" or disapproves of "fighting oppressive occupiers." Letting Israel's detractors introduce the issues in these terms means a supporter of Israel will have already lost any debate in the eyes of someone watching from the sidelines.

This is especially relevant on university campuses, where anti-Israel groups tend to be vocal and pervasive. They sway many people who aren't informed and don't really have an opinion, but are, of course, opposed to "ethnic cleansing." Israel thus becomes wrong on any issue of consequence.

I've also noticed that Israel advocacy suffers from another problem. I've heard several debates about Israel on campus, and I've noticed that the people arguing for Israel are often either unprepared or completely irrational.

People, please, if you want to make your opinion heard, please be informed.

Most recently, I had a debate with someone who was staunchly pro-Israel, but was not at all rational about it. His solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict was to flatten several Palestinian and/or Lebanese towns entirely, making sure that nothing remains of either terrorist or civilian populations, and ensuring that everyone understands that Israel would be prepared to do it again. The civilians, this person argued, supported the terrorists and thus were legitimate targets.

I was horrified. By saying that civilian targets are legitimate targets, this person was justifying terrorism itself.

The target, I said, should never be civilians, but terrorists. But in saying this, we shouldn't be squeamish about collateral damage. If a terrorist is surrounded by cute puppies, kitties and bunnies, the Israeli government should still place more importance on the life of Israeli citizens that the terrorist is trying to kill than the puppies and bunnies. Collateral damage is legitimate, but targeting civilians is not.

Once a normal person hears irrational and extremist pro-Israel arguments, the damage to Israel's reputation is difficult to repair. It's hard to convince people that Israel is a progressive and liberal country after they hear its supporters advocating that it engage in mass killing.

So I urge anyone – and especially students – who wants to advocate for Israel, (even if it's only when someone else brings up the issue) to be informed and rational.

Do some research, be realistic, and argue to convince an audience, not the opposing side.

Many tactics and arguments can be found on Neil Lazarus' website, www.awesomeseminars.com.

Learning about the Shoah – in Antigonish

One of the great things about living in Halifax is that students get the opportunity to do things that in a bigger city might be left to someone who is older and more experienced.

For the past year, I've had the privilege of working for the Atlantic Jewish Council as its director of Holocaust education, which has allowed me to oversee educational projects all over the region. I wasn't surprised to learn that the cities with organized Jewish communities hold a Yom Hashoah ceremony each year and invite survivors throughout the year to share their stories with local schoolchildren. I have been impressed with the hard work of people in these small communities to ensure that the legacy of the survivors live on. I was surprised, however, to discover the low level of Holocaust education among people outside the major cities, and for this reason, I made it a priority to initiate programming in areas without organized Jewish communities.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

This has led me to some fascinating discoveries about other people's perceptions of the Holocaust, an event that – for good reason – looms so large in the collective Jewish consciousness.

The first such discovery took place in Antigonish, N.S., a university town of 5,000 people two hours northeast of Halifax. I went to Antigonish last April with Susan Sandager, who performs a one-woman show in which she portrays Corrie ten Boom, a Christian woman from Holland who hid Jews in her home until she was caught by the Gestapo in 1944. We certainly got some funny looks – a 20-year old Jewish boy, driving around the Maritimes with a Baptist from New Mexico, who once in costume as an 80-year old Dutch lady, refuses to speak English in anything but a Dutch accent.

But the oddest moment came after Sandager finished her evening performance in Antigonish. Two ladies came up to me separately, each with tears in her eyes. Both hugged me – as the first Jew either of them had ever met – and informed me that if there was ever a Holocaust in Canada, I could come stay in their homes. They each informed me of the exact dimensions of their respective houses – both sounded quite spacious and were outside town, and thus would be ideal hiding spots.

I was unsure how to react – to be touched by their compassion or dismayed at their being so out of touch with reality, thinking that a genocide was an actual possibility in Canada. But I suppose that this was their way of expressing pain and regret for something that happened many years ago, and it reflected their need to make me understand which side of the persecutor-bystander-rescuer line they would stand on.

As part of my job, I've tried to find museums throughout the region to host an exhibit that we own called "The Courage to Remember," which is produced by the Simon Wiesenthal Center. This year, the only taker was the Colchester Historical Museum in Truro, N.S., a town of 12,000 about one hour north of Halifax.

I was pleasantly surprised that this museum – whose purpose is to document the history of Colchester County, of which Truro is the capital – decided that an exhibit on the Holocaust fit into its broader purpose. Working with the museum on the exhibit has provided another unique learning experience. Its curator admitted that she, too, had never met a single Jew before me (Truro has five), but that her friend's daughter works in a hospital in Montreal where she met a rabbi.

She told me that the rabbi suggested serving apples and honey at the exhibit's opening. Though it was a bit after Rosh Hashanah, I still thought it was a good idea and was impressed that the initiative came from the museum. Now that the exhibit has been open for a few weeks, the museum informs me that at least one person comes to see it every day, and that one woman comes all day, every day, to read the books that I left there as a companion to the exhibit.

While it's possible to look at the comic aspect of these experiences, I find it humbling to have a part in someone's first encounter with both Judaism and the Holocaust. These encounters have taught me to take nothing for granted and to continue to look for people who are open-minded and willing to learn.

The Kirshner File

'Happy is the woman who gave birth to him'

Diplomats come and go and are usually quickly forgotten, but Yaacov Herzog was one of those rare figures who left a mark and is still spoken of in respectful tones. Felled prematurely by a stroke in 1972, Herzog, the son of the chief rabbi of Ireland, was a close advisor to four Israeli prime ministers and Israel's ambassador to Canada. He was also a key figure during the 1956 Sinai war and the first Israeli official to carry on a dialogue, albeit in secrecy, with King Hussein of Jordan.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Michael Bar-Zohar, in a new biography, Yaacov Herzog (Halban), describes him as " a scholar by upbringing" and "a statesman by aptitude" whose shrewdness and intellectual breadth served him well at Israel's foreign ministry. One of prime minister David Ben-Gurion's chief aides during a tumultuous period in Israel's history, Herzog had the smarts, the personality and the connections to be foreign minister. Certainly, he was probably more qualified for the position than some of the individuals who filled it. But sadly enough, he never truly fulfilled his potential, his meteoric career having been thwarted by none other than Golda Meir, who succeeded Levi Eshkol, Herzog's patron, as prime minister.

In this volume, Bar-Zohar, a prolific author and former Labor party Knesset member, ranges far and wide. He clearly admires his subject, which is understandable, but the style is hagiographic rather than balanced. And while this is regrettable, Yaacov Herzog is still worth reading.

Herzog was born in Dublin on Dec. 21, 1921, during the festival of Chanukah, the son of Rabbi Isaac Halevi Herzog, the scion of a dynasty of rabbis and scholars. Herzog was three years younger than his brother, Chaim, who would be a general in the Israeli army, Israel's envoy to the United Nations, and finally, his country's president.

Herzog was separated from his parents when his father became the chief rabbi of Palestine in 1936, but he was reunited with them three years later. The separation, however, had a permanent impact, causing him to be introverted and distant. In Jerusalem, he was his father's secretary, advisor and speech writer. But when the 1948 Altalena affair broke, Herzog played "a crucial role" in mediating between the various factions, according to Bar-Zohar.

He adds that while Chaim rebelled against his religious upbringing, Herzog reveled in it. Indeed, Herzog was ordained as a rabbi. As the War of Independence raged, he was appointed head of the department of Christian communities in the newly created ministry of religious affairs. One of his primary duties was to attend to an unpleasant problem that arose during the war – the desecration and looting of churches and monasteries by Israeli soldiers. Several years later, he was put in charge of a special department for Jerusalem and seconded to Israel's United Nations delegation in Manhattan.

As a diplomat, Herzog "faithfully served senior officials and cabinet ministers who were less intelligent than he was," observes Bar-Zohar. But he had a weakness for wordiness, his writing style being flowery and his memoranda and letters being too long.

Still, in recognition of his abilities, he was promoted to acting head of the United States section at the foreign ministry, vaulting over older and more senior officials. In this capacity, he lobbied for a military defence agreement with the United States to match accords Washington had signed with certain Arab states.

When the Sinai war erupted, Herzog was constantly at Ben-Gurion's side, shouldering the burden of Israel's campaign to ward off the fury of the United States, which opposed the co-ordinated British, French and Israeli invasion. Herzog analyzed fire-and-brimstone messages from Washington and also drafted replies. Amid the turmoil and the wrangling, Herzog was essentially "the manager of Israel's foreign policy," displaying resolution and cool-headedness, Bar-Zohar notes. In a letter to Herzog's father, Ben-Gurion singled out his wisdom and his diligence. "Happy is the woman who gave birth to him," he wrote.

Herzog reached the peak of his political influence during this divisive war. Having proven his mettle, he was named minister at the Israeli embassy in Washington, D.C., which was on the front lines of Israeli diplomacy. The challenge facing him was awesome: to mend relations with the United States. And while he was up to the task, he was not properly rewarded for a job well done.

When the ambassador, Abba Eban, left his post, Herzog did not replace him, as might have been expected. Instead, he was made charge d'affaires pending the appointment of an ambassador, who turned out to be Abraham Harman, a future president of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Bar-Zohar speculates that Golda Meir, the foreign minister, blocked Herzog's promotion on the grounds that he was not a member of the ruling Mapai party. Nevertheless, Herzog had important work to do in Washington, playing a role in Ben-Gurion's historic meeting, in New York City, with the chancellor of West Germany, Konrad Adenauer.

Shortly afterward, Herzog was appointed ambassador to Canada, a post he had not sought, but for which he was thankful. The highlight of his ambassadorship was the 1961 public debate he waged with British historian Arnold Toynbee at McGill University in Montreal. In a series of lectures at McGill, Toynbee had claimed that the Parsee community in India and the Jewish people belonged to "failed" and "fossilized" civilizations. As well, Toynbee had compared Israel's treatment of the Palestinians with the Nazis' treatment of Jews.

Appalled by Toynbee's remarks, Herzog discovered that his claims had never been publicly challenged. Without consulting his superiors in Jerusalem, Herzog challenged the Briton to a debate, an act that triggered widespread trepidation in Montreal's Jewish community. "Many of its leaders responded with typical Diaspora timidity," Bar-Zohar writes sneeringly.

Pictured with Yaacov Herzog (far right) in 1968 are, from left, Israeli prime minister Levi Eshkol, Canadian prime minister Lester B. Pearson and Canadian foreign minister Paul Martin.

A Jewish delegation that included Maxwell Cohen, McGill's dean of law, urged Herzog to call off the debate, but he refused. Bar-Zohar's verdict is that Herzog was the better debater and won. Readers can judge for themselves by listening to a CD attached to the back cover of the book. Bar-Zohar rates the debate as "the most significant event" of Herzog's term in Canada. But he also notes that Herzog developed friendly relations with the Progressive Conservative prime minister John Diefenbaker and the Liberal foreign minister Paul Martin. Otherwise, Bar-Zohar tells us precious little about Israel's relationship with Canada during Herzog's fairly brief ambassadorship.

He does suggest, though, that while Herzog was a devoted family man, the demands of the ambassadorship were such that he did not spend much time with his wife and two daughters. "I loved him dearly, but he was an absent father," daughter Shira Herzog, now a Toronto resident, is quoted as saying.

Not long after he returned to Israel in the summer of 1963 to assume the position of deputy director general in the foreign ministry, Herzog conferred with King Hussein in London, England, at the office of the monarch's Jewish doctor. It was the first time King Hussein had met a representative of Israel, and Herzog was thrilled by the privilege of establishing a secret channel of communication with him. Herzog saw him many more times, but despite their conversations, Jordan attacked Israel in the Six Day War.

In 1966, Herzog succeeded Teddy Kollek as director of the foreign ministry, the loftiest job he had ever held. When the crisis leading up to the Six Day War began to simmer, Herzog urged the prime minister to explore all political avenues rather than to lash out at the Arabs. He was gravely concerned that a war with Egypt would result in high civilian casualties.

But once Israel initiated hostilities, Herzog turned hawkish, his messianic sentiments coming into play. He thought that Israel should conquer Amman, the capital of Jordan, and he became a fervent supporter of intensive Israeli settlement in the West Bank. Subsequently, he recommended that the Jordan River should be Israel's legal boundary in the east and that the West Bank should be jointly ruled by Israel and Jordan. In addition, he believed that the Palestinians in the territories should be encouraged to be resettled in Jordan. "Looking back, it is difficult to avoid the impression that Herzog was so elated by Israel's possession of… Judea and Samaria that it overwhelmed his political judgment," Bar-Zohar comments in one of the few critiques of Herzog.

With Golda Meir as prime minister, Herzog's star dimmed and his health suffered. Herzog died on March 6, 1972 at the age of 50. More than three decades have elapsed since his untimely death, but he is reverentially remembered in this book.

Hepatitis C patient needs new kidney and liver

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

About 20 years ago, Suzi Kind had a gallbladder operation – not, one would think, a terribly serious procedure.

Kind, however, was among those who contracted hepatitis C from a tainted blood transfusion. The effect on her was devastating.

In December 1999, her liver failed, and she received a liver transplant. Unfortunately, the drugs that treat hepatitis C proved too harsh for her system, and the treatment had to be stopped. She was placed on hemodialysis, but that treatment severely damaged her kidneys.

Now, Kind, 52, needs both a new liver and a new kidney.

Her daughter, Sherry, explained that her mother's kidneys aren't working at all, and her liver is only functioning a little bit.

"When the liver fails, other organs begin to fail, too. She is becoming confused, and might go into a liver coma."

In addition, fluid is collecting in her stomach, which causes considerable pain in her abdomen and back, her daughter said.

It's too late for a live donor transplant, Sherry said, and even with a cadaver, the donor must be the right blood type and the liver must be the right size.

What's more, the waiting period for a liver transplant is more than two years, and nearly 2,000 people are on the transplant list.

People are simply not signing organ donor cards, and so the demand for organs far outpaces the supply, Sherry said.

Suzi Kind, centre, with daughters Sherry, left, and Sarit

She and her sister, Sarit, are desperately trying to encourage organ donations. In Austria and Spain, Sherry notes, there are laws insisting on them, but "Canada and the U.S. have the lowest rate of organ donation in the world. We just don't know what to do anymore."

A hospital in the United States could help Suzi Kind, but it would cost $500,000.

Her family is trying to raise the money in the community. They are also waging a campaign to educate the public about the shortage of organ donors, and to push the government to introduce a "presumed consent" system for organ and tissue donations.

Last week, the family held a fundraising event to benefit the Canadian Liver Foundation. Sarit and Sherry have also spoken on television and to the press about their cause.

Suzi Kind's husband, Yosef, is not well either, having suffered several strokes. Nevertheless, he went to New York to pray for his wife at the grave of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

Sherry described her mom as an "amazing mother, hostess and cook who kept the family together."

She also described her as compassionate, recounting how she used to make sandwiches for a homeless person who had stationed himself outside the Food Basics store at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue, where she worked as a pharmacist's assistant.

She is a movie buff, and loves sewing, reading, talking to friends and travelling.

The family tries to cheer her up by bringing food, books and movies to her.

Still, Sherry said, "there is nothing worse than being in the hospital, totally dependent on others for everything."

For more information, call Sarit Kind at 416-573-5132 or Sherry Kind at 416-427-4636.

PROJECT NORTHERN RECOVERY

Repairing the Unseen Scars

Dr. Chava Ankor is an expert on psychological difficulties among children within Israel's education system. And her skills were certainly tested during this summer's war with Hezbollah.

The war, she says, psychologically affected at least 30% of northernIsraelis. One young patient still stutters even though the war is over. Another becomes hysterical when her mother suffers one of her ongoing panic attacks. Many children are constantly listening for sounds of a siren. Often the symptoms are unseen and some may not even show up for two years.

Dr. Ankor's patients are among the reasons for Project Northern Recovery, the next phase of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007.

Through your generosity, we're helping northern Israel's children make the transition from trauma to recovery.

Project Northern Recovery is also helping to finance a reinvigorated Fund for Victims of Terror, providing loans for small businesses on the brink of bankruptcy, and developing an initiative that will encourage northern families to stay in the area.

As Dr. Ankor knows so well, the emergency facing northern Israel is far from over and critical needs remain.

Survivor eulogizes Czestochowa's Jewish community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Jewish community in Poland that was virtually obliterated by the Nazis was eulogized recently by one of its native sons.

At a Holocaust Education Week event at the Miles Nadal JCC, the glories of Czestochowa were evoked by Sigmund Rolat, the president of the World Society of Czestochowa Jews and their Descendants.

Holocaust Education Week

On the eve of World War II, 40,000 Jews lived in Czestochowa, comprising roughly one-third of its population.

"We were the industrial, commercial and cultural engine of the city," said Rolat, the sponsor of the "Jews of Czestochowa" touring exhibition, which is expected to reach Toronto next autumn after an extended run in Poland and the United States.

"The textile industry, the first theatre, was founded by Jews," he added.

The Jews of Czestochowa – the citadel of Christianity in Poland – were doomed once Germany invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939. They were abused, shot, ghettoized, put to work in German war production factories, and deported to Auschwitz and Treblinka.

Rolat, whose father was killed in the 1943 Treblinka uprising, survived by going into hiding and working at a slave labour camp, Hasag Pelcery.

By the end of World War II, only about 6,000 of the city's Jews were still alive.

Rolat, 15 years old in 1945, emigrated after the Kielce pogrom a year later.

"It was difficult to be a Jew in Poland," he said, speaking of the anti-Semitic atmosphere that pervaded the country after the Nazi defeat.

"You didn't know if you would survive the train ride from Czestochowa to Krakow."

Rolat, having immigrated to the United States, became a successful businessman. A frequent visitor to Poland, where he has investments, Rolat is now a promoter of Polish-Jewish dialogue and a sponsor of the soon-to-be-built Museum of the History of Polish Jews in the centre of Warsaw.

Two-and-a-half years ago, Rolat was present at the dedication of the "Jews of Czestochowa" exhibition in his hometown. It took place at the philharmonic hall, the site of what had been a newly built synagogue that was burned to the ground by the Nazis.

The exhibition, consisting of photographs and artifacts, has been seen in New York City, Washington, D.C., and Detroit.

It will be in Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., from December until January, and then in Houston, Texas.

A small portion was on display at the JCC and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto for almost two weeks until last week.

Peter Jassem, the president of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, said the exhibition is expected to arrive in Toronto next November, if a suitable venue is found.

Rolat said he sponsored the touring exhibit for a number of reasons.

"I wanted to show my children and grandchildren, and all young people, whether Jewish or not, what Jewish life was like in Czestochowa before, during and after the war. I wanted to bring knowledge of this lost heritage."

The first known Jews settled in the city in 1608 after Poland's disastrous war with Sweden. By the 19th century, Czestochowa was an important industrial centre, thanks in no small part to Jewish entrepreneurs.

With the exhibition, Rolat also hoped to demolish a "slanderous myth" that all Jews went to their deaths like sheep to the slaughter.

Finally, in co-operation with Czestochowa's municipal authorities, he used the inauguration of the exhibit as a catalyst to clean up the town's neglected Jewish cemetery, which had become overgrown and inaccessible to visitors.

Rolat said that, thanks to continually new contributions, the exhibition is still growing. To prove his point, he held aloft a creased Holocaust-era poster, in German and Polish, warning Poles that they risked execution if they helped Jews.

Saying that Jews were never "a foreign element" in Poland, though they were sometimes treated as outsiders by xenophobic and racist Poles, Rolat observed that many young Poles are eager and curious to learn about Poland's Jewish dimension.

Yet the contemporary Jewish community in Czestochowa is but a pale shadow of its prewar self.

Shortly after the war, nearly every Jewish survivor still remaining in the city left Poland.

"It would take a great effort to find a handful of Jews in Czestochowa today," lamented Jassem, who introduced Rolat as a speaker.

By Rolat's estimate, less than 100 Jews currently reside in Czestochowa.

"But it's not a community reborn," he said. "Not quite."

'Lost boy' tells CCRJ of long trek to freedom

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Daniel Akech James came a long way to tell his story.

Born in southern Sudan in 1983, James was a "Lost Boy," one of hundreds of orphaned refugees from his country's civil war who in 1987 were forced to trek hundreds of miles through Africa.

Here recently to speak at the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism's biennial convention, held at Temple Emanu-El, James told the group how he was separated from many of the boys and was forced to travel around Africa by foot for 12 years until he reached a Kakuma refugee camp in northern Kenya in 1999.

Daniel Akech James

Then 16, James spoke no English and had never had formal schooling. He studied English – his fourth language – and went to school while waiting for his refugee application to be approved by the U.S. government. In 2001, he landed in San Diego.

Once there, he passed his high school equivalency exam and was one of the first "Lost Boys" to enrol in San Diego City College.

Only 1½ years later, he transferred to the University of San Diego, and this past summer he graduated with a degree in mathematics and theology. He's now working on his PhD in mathematics.

He said that while he's proud of his academic achievements, he's dedicated to his native language, culture and people and is in the final stages of editing a book-length document about the use of the Dinka language.

The document includes a Dinka-English dictionary and relevant cultural background.

He also feels it's his duty "to tell the world my story, and raise awareness about what's happening in Sudan," where a pro-government Arab militia, the Janjaweed, has killed thousands of civilians in the country's Darfur region.

"It's not happening to black people, or to people in Africa. It is a world problem," James said. "The government uses religion as a tool to wipe out tribes, and if we don't act now we don't know who will be next. We don't want another [generation] of lost boys."

James praised the Jewish community for being the only one to take the Darfur issue seriously. "Jews still have a memory of the Holocaust, so if anything bad happens to [another] community, it is easy to be sympathetic."

He urged the gathering to put pressure on the Canadian government to act on behalf of the people of Darfur. "That is the [best you can do.] You can't send money, because it is not accessible there."

Cheryl Englander, CCRJ national social action chair, said Canadians have to continue asking for help from people in power. "We need to continue to push our government to [acknowledge] that it is our responsibility."

The CCRJ's social action committee plans to send the government reminder cards on a monthly basis, and it's asking others to do the same. "If you don't see them at your congregation, ask the rabbi or the social action chair. There is no postage required," Englander said.

"We can do something. We have the capability of being a moral superpower in the world."

WAR MEMORIAL UNVEILED: Jewish War Veterans of Canada recently unveiled a stained glass memorial at Beth Torah Congregation dedicated to the one million Canadian men and women, and particularly 20,000 Jews, who fought in both world wars, as well as in Korea and South Africa. Jewish Life

The lost children of Yemen – Pt. 2

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The Jews of Yemen came to Israel shortly after it declared its independence. In crowded camps and unsanitary conditions, disease was rampant among them. Children, and especially infants, were separated from their reluctant parents and sent to hospitals for treatment.

Through A Sephardi Window

Parents who gave their infants over to the hospital for treatment would naturally return the very next day to inquire about their child's recovery and to spend precious time with them. And they would usually travel a great distance on foot to do so.

At the hospital, these parents were met with avoidance and treated as an outright annoyance. The fact was that the staff could barely cope, and that staff and parents couldn't understand each other because of a language barrier.

But frantic parents wouldn't take no for an answer, and on their own, they'd go searching for their children in the wards, room by room, calling out their names as they went. This behaviour further angered, and alienated them from, hospital staff. Eventually, many parents were taken aside and told that their child had died.

It is, of course, quite possible, reasonable and even understandable to believe that some of the children died. In illness, some will recover, while others will not.

Here, however, begins the mystery: no bodies were ever returned to the families; no one was ever summoned to a funeral; no graves – marked or unmarked – were ever shown to parents; no deaths were registered and no certificates were issued. There was no ritual with which to heal, no occasion on which to grieve, no grave to comfort parents, and no yahrzeit to commemorate. Nothing.

These children, numbering in the hundreds, disappeared as if they had never existed.

Hapless parents were hysterical. At first, they would refuse to accept the explanation that their child had died, and they returned to the hospital and repeated their searches day after day. Only when police were called and threats of arrest were made would such scenes cease.

The Yemenites were recent immigrants, innocent and powerless, who could neither speak out nor stand up for themselves, and they were easily silenced. Eventually, the raw pain of their losses subsided. Other priorities came along: the family had to survive, jobs had to be filled, and a new life had to be established.

But without any form of closure, their grief could not be resolved. In its place, there was guilt and shame – haunting guilt at having given away a child, and searing shame at being so gullible and naive.

These families were forever marked by the presence of an unspoken sadness. Half a century has passed, and no formal inquiry or commission will ever quell the sentiment of a parent whose child has disappeared.

That some of theses babies really died is unquestionable, and that others got lost in the shuffle is just as probable.

But the claim that several hundred died is impossible.

Allegations that these babies were summarily allocated to childless parents have been made over the years. In Israel, many an urban legend has it that those slim, tall, dark-skinned sabra children of fairer, shorter European parents are, in fact, the abducted and adopted babies of Yemen.

The whole truth of this episode will remain a mystery.

The pain and sadness of a parent whose child went missing will, alas, also remain, and never go away.

Guest Voice

Touring Israel's Beit Halochem centres

By RENA GODFREY

Experiencing Israel has always been on the top of my "must do" list. When I was a student I worked many evenings to support this habit of mine, so I could immerse myself in the warmth of Israeli culture for a few glorious months. Whether working on a kibbutz or renting an apartment in Jerusalem, my summer excursions were carefree and intriguing.

Skip to twentysomething years later when roaming the streets of Jerusalem and the hills of the Golan are definitely not in the picture. I'm attached to family and have commitments; life is rewarding but not exactly "free."

This year, however, something totally unexpected happened to me. I decided to go on a mission with an organization called Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada. The whole idea of riding on a bus with people whom I didn't know didn't exactly thrill me. I thought, "Hey, I'm only 43 years old – don't I have to be at least 65 to join this crew?"

I soon realized that this mission, led by Toby and Saul Feldberg, did not require its participants to be of any certain age or status. We were a diversified group of 30- to 80-year-olds, men and women, single, married and divorced. Some were connected to Beit Halochem and others were not. Toby and Saul were determined to show us their passion for Israel and their unconditional support for the many Israeli disabled veterans and victims of terror.

Our emotional journey began an hour after our arrival in Israel, when we stopped at the Kotel before Shabbat for a Shehechiyanu and an impromptu hora. Immediately, strangers became friends as young and old embraced.

Intermingled with the expected touring of the country came the unexpected. We established connections with many of the disabled veterans and victims of terror, who are members of the four Beit Halochem centres in Israel.

We toured the centres and learned firsthand how Israel takes care of their disabled, both physically and emotionally. Disabled vets we encountered told us their stories of loss and then rebirth as they discovered new abilities, nurtured by the staff members at Beit Halochem.

Before this trip, I would have never imagined that I could actually do the tango with a man confined to a wheelchair or see a man without legs train on horseback for the equestrian Paralympics, or watch a blind man golf. Wheelchairs are the chariots of these disabled men and women who so proudly and enthusiastically participate in Olympic-level basketball, tennis and swimming programs. They also participate in pottery making and art classes, hydrotherapy, physiotherapy and other treatments and programs.

One evening we dined at Beit Halochem, Tel Aviv, able-bodied beside the disabled, chit-chatting with one another, joking and smiling. I listened to a 19-year-old boy play one of his compositions on guitar for us. He lost both legs while on duty in Lebanon this summer. I sat and chatted with a young gynecologist who lost his arm and almost his life while trying to care for the wounded in Lebanon. He remains hopeful that he will be able to continue practising medicine.

Then Toby got up to say a few poignant words and, without warning, broke down in the middle of her speech. I fought back my tears, knowing that beside me the eyes of several beautiful young men who had just lost their limbs were looking at me... at us.

The evening ended with lively music, dancing and fun.

In fact, despite the many heart-wrenching stories we heard during the day, every evening on this mission ended in lots of laughter and joke-telling before we retired for the night. We needed to unwind and relax after such a full and emotional day.

Now that I have returned to my home in peaceful Toronto, my tears have also returned. I keep on thinking that if I had chosen to live in Israel, as I had planned to in my 20s, I could very well be a disabled veteran or victim of terror. Perhaps my husband or children, or aunt or cousin or friends could be living without an arm, a leg, or suffering from posttraumatic stress disorder.

These brave men and women that I had the pleasure of meeting willingly and lovingly sacrificed their bodies and souls for Israel's safety, for the safety of all Jews in the Diaspora, and for my safety.

Life can change for anyone in a split second. My split second happened on this mission.

Rena Godfrey lives in Toronto.

Mamet excoriates assimilated Jews

The Wicked Son: Anti-Semitism, Self-hatred, and the Jews by David Mamet, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

David Mamet, the Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright and filmmaker, has written a provocative and angry book.

In 37 brief essays he deals largely with three major themes: the persistence of anti-Semitism, the sickness of self-hating Jews and the rich resources of Judaism available to those who care.

Adopting the metaphor of "the wicked son," who at the Passover seder asks the question, "What does this observance mean to you?" Mamet excoriates assimilated Jews who are quick to find meaning and inspiration in other religions, who criticize and denigrate the State of Israel and who attach themselves to a variety of fashionable political and cultural trends.

In his ire he asks: "Who is this… free-thinker, newly convinced Episcopalian, detractor of Israel, and whose approval is he courting? Does he think that his brave assertion of his racial taint, coupled with a repudiation of his people's history, traditions and religion, is going to win him friends anywhere?"

Unhappily, some of the author's strictures border on the hysterical. "Jews who turn their Seders into an expression of enlightened liberal sentiment on the issue of the day are neurotics. Jews who write their own marital vows rather than using the thousands-year-old-formula of Judaism are 'Epicureans.' Jews who support a two-state solution to Israel's conflict with the Arab world are seeking the end of Israel. The secular Jew who attends the local Yiddish discussion group but not the local synagogue is a turncoat."

Consumed with self-righteous passion, he argues that religious observance is the only authentic expression of Judaism. He seem unaware of the many new and varied approaches to Jewish identity and the opportunities for creative involvement in the broad Jewish community.

Mamet overlooks the reality that for most North American Jews – comfortable and secure members of the middle class – anti-Semitism is not a problem. On the contrary, Jews now play a significant and disproportionate role in all aspects of modern society.

Actually, the primary cause for apathy, indifference and alienation among many Jews is their doubt and uncertainty about the worthwhileness of Judaism. What is lost or unlearned for them is the "rationale of Judaism," which consists of the ideas and ideals that are the unique and abiding creation of the Jewish genius. About all of this – the nature and content of this precious heritage – the author has little to say.

About the State of Israel, Mamet is steadfast. "Imagine the anti-Israeli propaganda currently engaged in on college campuses and other institutions of enlightenment directed against Canada – not that Canadians are misguided, wrong, but that they are 'bad' – devoid of the capacity for goodwill, duplicitous, inspired by some nefarious and implacable power to wrong those around them; possessed of a power so diabolical it induces their neighbours to strap bombs on their young and send them into the marketplace to slaughter women and their babies."

Mamet is not easy to read. His style is convoluted and often opaque. He makes reference to Jews as a race, speaks of a "6,000-year-old tradition" (that would go back 2,000 years before Abraham) and is understandably repelled by the very Jews who presumably he is trying to redeem.

The wicked son deserves condemnation, but Mamet's aggressive and confused analysis will neither convince nor encourage those two other sons mentioned in the Haggadah: the simple one and the one too ignorant to even ask the proper questions.

Readers recommend

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, once again, I turn the tables and let readers recommend their favourite Israeli and Jewish websites.

The great thing about the Internet is that there is a world of information at your fingertips. The problem with the Internet is that a lot of that information is wrong. A while back I did a column about sites that try to debunk the rumours and hoaxes on the web (like the infamous lie that 4,000 Jews stayed home from work at the World Trade Center on 9/11.) [http://tinyurl.com/yjmw24] Yael Yunger has written to me about JewishLegends.com, which sets out to get to the bottom of dozens of Jewish urban legends. Let's see if you can guess whether following are true or false:

- The first trains to Treblinka left on Tisha b' Av.
- A Jew flew an airplane before the Wright Brothers.
- Third baseman Wade Boggs drew a chai in the dirt before every at-bat.

[www.jewishlegends.com]

Earlier this year, I did a column about incredible videos you can find online. Remy Landau has done some digging and sent along this note: "This Internet medium is overwhelming. And while much of what it shows is dross, there is also a staggering amount of very high-quality offerings." Landau came across a marvellous 26-minute documentary about Daniel Liebeskind's Jewish Museum in Berlin [http://tinyurl.com/ym9clf], the entire 1920 silent motion picture, The Golem [http://tinyurl.com/yev9px] and a real find, Jewish Life in Munkatch (Hungary) – March 1933. This incredible piece of video presents everything from a large group of children singing Hatikvah, young people dancing a hora in a public square, and scenes from the wedding of Rabbi Rabinowitz to Frime Chaye Rivke Shapira, daughter of Grand Rebbe Eleazer Shapira of Munkatch. I highly recommend this rare and exuberant glimpse of prewar Jewish life. [http://tinyurl.com/ynxzy5]

Irwin Glasberg passed along a couple of favourite sites I hadn't visited before: TheYeshivaWorld.com and SeraphicSecret.Seraphic Secret is an award-winning blog created by Robert J. Avrech, whose home-page biography hooked me even before I read his first entry: "I'm an Emmy Award winning screenwriter. I'm also an observant Jew, a religious Zionist, a fierce conservative Republican, and a member of the NRA. I've been writing and producing in Hollywood for over 25 years. But the focus of my life is my family: my radiant wife, Karen, whom I have been in love with since I was 10 years old, and my two daughters, who, thankfully, look like Karen. Not too long ago, we had three children. But our son, Ariel, died at the age of 22 from pulmonary fibrosis. We miss him terribly. We think about him practically every minute of every day. People tell us that time heals, but Karen and I know that is not true. Time grinds away doing its terrible work. Ariel is gone. Yet absence becomes presence." [www.seraphicpress.com]

I normally don't focus on commercial sites in my column, however, I received an e-mail about one Israeli site that takes a novel approach and is worth a look. Visitors to Tel Aviv will be familiar with Sheinkin Street, a vibrant area bursting with shops and galleries. Sheinkin Street, the website, tries to duplicate that experience by creating a community of online shops for the dozens of merchants who make their home on the real Sheinkin Street. Even if you just prefer to virtual window-shop, the site has plenty of information about this neighbourhood, including biographies of the people behind the historic street names you'll find in this community. [www.shenkinstreet.com]

And if you are in the mood to shop, check out my earlier column with tips for safe online spending. [http://tinyurl.com/ych468]

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website, blog or podcast? Or have you created one yourself? Tell me about it at the address below and I may mention it in a future column. (By the way, about the "rumours": all true.)

Amiel rips militant Islam and the United Nations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Fervently right-wing journalist Barbara Amiel came out swinging last week, lambasting militant Islam, attacking the United Nations, denigrating the record of former U.S. president Bill Clinton and claiming that anti-Semitism might be beneficial for Jews.

Amiel, a Maclean's columnist and wife of former newspaper tycoon Conrad Black, made her acidic comments in a wide-ranging, hard-hitting speech at Holy Blossom Temple.

Delivering the second Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season, Amiel, known too as Lady Black of Crossharbour, said that the Islamic world has been left behind in cultural, technical and military terms, possibly because Islam has never undergone a reformation.

Introduced by film producer Robert Lantos as a woman of substance and beauty, Amiel charged that the west is currently appeasing the forces of Islamic radicalism. But she said that western nations ultimately will not allow "theocratic Islam" to win.

Declaring that the United Nations willfully ignores Islamic terrorism, Amiel branded the UN as "that parliament of hypocrisy."

She suggested that John Bolton, the current U.S. ambassador to the UN, has been refreshingly effective.

Amiel, the former editor of the Toronto Sun, accused Clinton of "appeasement and dithering" in formulating policy toward such Islamic radical groups and countries as Hezbollah and Iran.

But even Democrats have America's national interests at heart, she allowed.

A British immigrant to Canada, she said that Jews today are the victims of love, assimilation, hate and anti-Semitism.

Paraphrasing the philosopher Baruch Spinoza, Amiel said that anti-Semitism has kept Jews together. "So it can be argued, perversely, that the current wave of anti-Semitism is good for Jews."

Although Jews face challenges, they should know that Jewish identity cannot be erased.

"Go home and procreate," she urged her listeners, saying that the Jewish birthrate is too low at present.

Clad in a chic black outfit, Amiel, an elegant, impossibly slim woman, confessed that her "shortcomings" are all too apparent. As she succinctly put it, she neither speaks Hebrew nor prays, and is married to a dedicated Roman Catholic.

Asserting that Israel's performance in last summer's war with Hezbollah had been less than stellar, she suggested that Israel's military and political establishment was in dire need of a shakeup.

In light of that war, Israel as a "lifeboat for Jews" looks "leaky," she said, adding there is presently no more dangerous a country for Jews than Israel.

But Jews need Israel – "a miraculous, magnificent construction" – to maintain their Jewish identity, Amiel observed.

Decrying the post-Zionist call for a multicultural, secular Israel, she said that Israel's Judaic character must be maintained.

Amiel claimed that "systematic anti-Semitism" in Canada is channelled through the funnel of anti-American and anti-Israel sentiments.

Without naming names, she said that some members of Canada's media and academic elites, including Jews, spout anti-Semitic and anti-Israel views.

Warming to her topic, Amiel said that anti-Semitism is now a redoubt of the anti-capitalist left.

Her comments received a sustained round of applause.

PAST AND PRESENT: Sally Wasserman, centre, spoke to BBYO on Nov. 8 as part of the teen group's Holocaust Remembrance Week program. After watching the film Paper Clips, about a Tennessee school's efforts to commemorate and learn about the Holocaust by collecting millions of paper clips, the teens heard Sally's story of surviving the liquidation of her town's ghetto in Poland during World War II.

Bad news and false expectations

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, much of the news from the Middle East was bad. Disorder, chaos and growing threats to stability seemed to be coming from almost every corner. Among the headlines:

• In an attempt to destabilize the Lebanese government, six cabinet ministers allied or belonging to Hezbollah resigned. Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah was quoted as saying, "This government will go." However, Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora vowed not to give in to Hezbollah's demands and pressed ahead with an international tribunal mandated to investigate the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

• Repeating his threats to Israel, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad also announced significant progress in his country's nuclear program, while the International Atomic Energy Agency reported that it had detected plutonium and enriched uranium in an Iranian nuclear waste facility.

• According to Steven Edwards of the National Post ("Somalia risks becoming another Iraq, UN experts say," Nov. 16), a UN report accused Iran of supplying Somali Islamists, who have seized control of the capital Mogadishu, with arms in exchange for Somali-mined uranium.

• Violence and chaos continued unabated in Iraq, with the United States, under newly elected Democratic party majorities in both houses of Congress, reportedly looking for a quick exit strategy.

• In the territories, Hamas and Fatah struggled to forge a new Palestinian Authority government led by "technocrats," although there was no expectation that even they might meet the Quartet's (the European Union, Russia, the United States and United Nations) requirements for resuming financial aid: recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous peace agreements. Still, reports circulated that Russia, the Arab states and some Europeans were favouring the resumption of aid anyway.

• Hamas, which repeated its rejection of Israel's right to exist, reportedly has managed to smuggle 30 tons of TNT and heavy arms, including rockets, into Gaza through tunnels from Egypt. Meanwhile, Hamas stepped up its firing of Qassam rockets into Israel last week, killing an Israeli woman in the town of Sderot and wounding others.

• Members of Fatah's al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade vowed to stage suicide bombings inside Israel to "avenge" the recent deaths of civilians in Beit Hanoun, according to a report by the Globe and Mail's Mark MacKinnon ("Support grows for new intifadah", Nov. 13).

However, not all the news was that grim – at least not on the surface. Running alongside MacKinnon's piece in the Globe was a Reuters item titled "Arab League calls for new Mideast peace conference." Reuters reported that at the Arab League's meeting in Cairo, there had been calls for an international meeting to "resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute based on the principle of land for peace."

Ironically, one of the foreign ministers in attendance was Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas, which is dedicated to Israel's destruction. Reuters noted that Zahar, who is well known for his extreme anti-Israel rhetoric, refused to say "whether the group would attend the proposed peace conference." According to some Israeli analysts, Hamas' involvement made the idea of the conference appear farcical.

Israel's response was that the idea is premature, because such a conference is called for in the second stage of the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan. However, the first stage of the road map, which calls for the end of Palestinian violence, and the disarming and dismantling of terrorist organizations such as Hamas, has not yet been met.

Still, Israel is coming under increasing international pressure to make concessions for "peace," even though conditions are far from auspicious.

With the war in Iraq and even Afghanistan providing no end of foreign policy woes for U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, several Western leaders, including Blair, are desperate for something that will show progress, ostensibly to the Arab world.

Apparently, this will involve reaching out to the Palestinians with a bold new "peace" initiative designed to break the diplomatic deadlock. Such thinking is dangerously wrong, because it creates false expectations and ignores reality.

What drives Drive for Dreidels?

New partnership benefits community's children at Chanukah

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

Making sure every Jewish child in the Greater Toronto Area has a new toy at Chanukah is a tall order, especially when at least 3000 of them live below the poverty line and countless others belong to our community's working poor. For the past four years, however, Drive for Dreidels has galvanized Jewish Toronto to brighten up the holiday for kids in need. Originating in the inspired vision of the Cooper/Shear family and facilitated by Jewish Family and Child Service, this year's toy drive will reach even more children because National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section (NCJWC-TS), has also joined the dynamic partnership.

"We are thrilled to be working with other caring agencies and individuals, giving us the opportunity to broaden our scope and help more people," explained NCJWC-TS President, Debbie Wasserman. "National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section, is committed to addressing the needs of the impoverished in our community, particularly the needs of the children."

It was the recognition of just how urgent those needs are that motivated Bob Cooper to approach his brother Josh and mother Bonnie Lawrence Shear about launching a community toy collection in the first place. Jewish Family and Child Service was the logical partnership choice for the Cooper/Shear family and, in 2003, Drive for Dreidels made its Toronto debut. The community responded swiftly and with great generosity, but no one anticipated just how creative and committed the Jewish Toronto would be in its support.

The drive soon outgrew JF&CS's limited space , so it moved the storage and sorting operation to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, next door. "We are very grateful to the BJCC for stepping up to ensure we were able to keep the momentum going," said Karen Paikin, Manager of Communications for JF&CS. "And now we have the good fortune to partner with another neighbour, NCJWC-TS."

New, unwrapped toys can be delivered to NCJWC-TS, 4700 Bathurst Street, starting on Sunday, November 26 until Sunday, December 3. Drop-off hours are: Sunday, 10 am - 1 pm; Monday through Thursday, 8:30 am - 4 pm; Tuesday and Thursday evening, 6 - 8 pm. If you would like to give a present to an older child or teen, gift certificates to book, music or department stores are welcome choices and should be delivered to JF&CS directly, Lipa Green Building, 6th Floor, 4600 Bathurst Street. More information can be obtained by calling NCJWC-TS at 416.633.5100 or JF&CS at 416.638.7800.

"Drive for Dreidels brings our community closer together," noted Linda Steinberg, Service Portfolio Chair of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section.

Speaking for his family, Bob Cooper is "thrilled to be welcoming National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section, into Drive for Dreidels. I know they will be very helpful," he said, "in helping us reach our original goal of making sure every needy Jewish child in our community receives a gift this year."

Understanding Bipolar and Anxiety Disorders

Depression. Anxiety. Mood Disorders. The sobering reality of modern life is that one in five people will experience depression or bipolar disorder in his or her lifetime, according to the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario (MDAO). Effective treatment and prevention start with wider access to support and information, but many people have no idea where to turn for help or if help is even possible. Jewish Family and Child Service is striving to change that and its comprehensive Family Life Education program is poised to help spread the word.

On November 23, JF&CS will feature Karen Liberman, Executive Director of the MDAO as guest speaker for a community forum on Understanding Bipolar and Anxiety Disorders. This highly anticipated evening lecture is the fourth in a series on mood disorders, coordinated by JF&CS in conjunction with the MDAO.

"In the fall of 2004," explained Shawna Sidney, Family Life Education Coordinator for JF&CS, "we partnered with the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario in an extremely well received program, Depression 101. Positive response from that evening," Sidney said, "launched follow-up opportunities, dedicated to helping individuals and families affected by mood disorders."

Karen Liberman, MDAO Executive Director

The Mood Disorders Association of Ontario is committed to "enhancing the quality of life for all affected by mood disorders through support, information, education and advocacy" and it's touching new audiences through cooperative programming opportunities like Understanding Bipolar and Anxiety Disorders.

Understanding Bipolar and Anxiety Disorders will be held on the 4th Floor of the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street, starting at 7 pm, November 23, 2006. Registration is required and space is limited. To reserve a seat ($10 each), please call Shawna Sidney at 416.638.7800, ex 215.

The Family Life Education program of JF&CS is a community outreach program, providing a wide array of psycho-educational groups and workshops to the community, led by trained, knowledgeable and experienced facilitators. "Family Life Education is a solid cornerstone of Jewish Family and Child Service's focus on prevention," noted Sidney.

A complete, updated listing of all JF&CS Family Life Education Programs is available online at www.jfandcs.com or by calling Shawna Sidney at 416. 638. 7800, ex 215.

Honouring Gordy Wolfe's indelible imprint on JF&CS

Agency renames its downtown branch

It was a common question for over two decades. "So, you work at Gordy's Place?" But no one meant the neighbourhood eatery or local pub, even though the spot was a local fixture all the same. Gordy's Place was the affectionate reference to Jewish Family and Child Service during the 22 years Gordon S. Wolfe served as the agency's Executive Director. And, although he retired from JF&CS three years ago, his imprint remains and his commitment to excellence lives on in the quality of the professional staff.

In an earlier career, JF&CS President, David Pelz, worked with Wolfe and describes the profound impact that relationship had on his future. "The lessons I learned from Gordy have stayed with me and helped provide me with a direction for my life. He taught me the meaning of tikkun olam (healing the world) and what it means to devote one's life to social justice," Pelz continued. "The day-to-day battle to right the injustices in our society was Gordy's core and I like to think a small piece of him rubbed off on me."

In September, the downtown branch of JF&CS (Bloor and Spadina) at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre was officially renamed The Gordon S. Wolfe Branch. Gordy's family, friends and colleagues joined him at a reception to celebrate the event.

Current JF&CS Executive Director Richard Cummings reflected on Wolfe's enduring vision and unwavering sense of social responsibility to the community.

JF&CS Board President David Pelz pays tribute to his mentor Gordon S. Wolfe at branch naming ceremony.

"Gordy had the consistent ability to influence his colleagues, staff and volunteers to do their utmost to ensure that the mission of JF&CS received the attention and support it needed. As an agency, as a community," Cummings added, "we are ever grateful."

The Jewish Hospice Program is all about living

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

For many of us, palliative care conjures up sad and somber images of death and dying. But, for two people who are at the very heart of the Jewish Hospice Program, palliative care is all about living life to its fullest possible potential. "Whether it's for eighty minutes or eighty years," explains Rabbi Ronald Weiss, Director of Chaplaincy Services for Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) and an integral member of the Jewish Hospice team, "we strive to maximize each person's quality of life, recognizing that care is often as important as cure."

Launched 13 years ago, the Jewish Hospice Program, coordinated by JF&CS, is a partnership of Baycrest, Circle of Care, Mount Sinai Hospital and UJA Federation. The program is designed to provide compassionate end of life care to people dealing with life-threatening illnesses, while enabling them to live in the comfort of their own home and make decisions about their health care for themselves. The Jewish Hospice responds to the many accompanying physical, psychological, social and spiritual concerns and, annually, serves 100 client families, including approximately 15 children.

Bev Schachter, who took over as Coordinator of the Jewish Hospice Program last February, describes her experience as "a breath of fresh air."

"I was no stranger to gerontology and palliative care but the unique nature of JF&CS enabled me to offer clients a remarkable range of support. Everyone who accesses the Jewish Hospice Program," she explained, "has full access to all the programs and services JF&CS provides."

"What that means for clients," Schachter explained, "is the peace of mind that comes from knowing we are there to assist them with any current or resultant problems – from financial difficulty to unemployment, marital issues to depression."

The Jewish Hospice Program, which works in conjunction with Ontario Ministry of Health services and receives additional funding for special projects from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. In the last few years, UJA Federation support has enabled the Jewish Hospice to develop a respite program, so families get a much-needed break on a regular basis.

As well, grants from UJA Federation have significantly enhanced resource materials available to Hospice clients. A resource bag program has been established, specifically for children, providing them with workbooks and story books dealing with terminal illness and dying, as well as art supplies to help them express their feelings. In addition, a resource centre, housed at JF&CS, offers books, videos and other informational materials for both children and adults affected by life-threatening illnesses.

There are many volunteer opportunities with the Jewish Hospice Program for sensitive, caring adults who recognize the value of quality end of life care. To learn more about the Jewish Hospice Program, call Bev Schachter at 416. 638.7800, ex 201.

Homework's a hit for York Region students

JF&CS Homework Club provides extra support

When Noy and Bar enthusiastically rush off to the Promenade Mall on Tuesday nights, it's not to chill with their buddies. They're meeting up with 15 other kids from grades 4 to 9 at the Homework Club, a new initiative of Jewish Family and Child Service for students in York Region. And, after less than two months, the Homework Club is certainly scoring straight A's from the eager participants. "I like that I learn stuff in this program and that there are people who can help me with my homework. I like getting pizza - it's really fun and my best friend is here," said Lilach, Grade 6.

The York Region Homework Club started as a JF&CS pilot project last spring and met with tremendous success. Andrea Pines, the JF&CS Coordinator of Volunteer Services, who heads up the Homework Club, reports that all of the students involved in the original pilot signed up again for the fall. "Response has been wonderful and our volunteer tutors – all nine of them – are as excited as the 16 kids who come out every Tuesday."

Homework Club tutors are mainly university students, recruited from Hillel on the York, U of T and Ryerson campuses, and they are a truly talented and energetic team," Pines said. "The students, their parents and JF&CS are very grateful to them, and to Tzedek Hillel's Social Action Director Devora Schwartz Waxman for finding such an outstanding group for us."

The Homework Club has also received invaluable support from Frontier College and North York Community House, which have partnered in the project to provide tutor training, worksheets, resources and other support as needed."

Geared to provide extra academic help for students already receiving professional support from JF&CS in area schools, students must be referred to the program through a social worker. Jewish Family and Child Service staff works with students in many GTA day and public schools, sometimes because of social or behavioural issues. In other cases, the problem stems from English being a second language and parents being unable to assist their children with their studies.

That's another reason why the Homework Club is such a popular place to be on Tuesday nights. And not only do the kids receive skilled tutoring, personal attention and study opportunities, there's hot pizza and cold drinks too! Who knew doing homework could be so much fun? If you'd like to find out more about the Homework Club in York Region, contact Andrea Pines at JF&CS, 416. 638.7800, ex 266.

JF&CS Homework Club is the newest "place to be" for York Region students. Homework Club Volunteer Sean Friedman (L) shares a pizza break with grade 8 student Bar.

Singing the praises of unsung heroes

JF&CS Board of Directors hits the high notes

Dr. Richard Cummings, Executive Director of Jewish Family and Child Service, is meticulous in his pursuit of evidence-based research to back up his assertions. So, when he describes the contribution of the agency's volunteer leaders as inspiring, he can substantiate the claim. "During its almost 140-year history, Jewish Family and Child Service has attracted a level of volunteer leadership that continues to inspire excellence in every aspect of service to the community," said Cummings. "Truly, these men and women have always been the unsung heroes of JF&CS."

A look through names from past JF&CS Boards of Directors reads like a Who's Who of Jewish Toronto.

Anti-Israel activists rally at York, U of T

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

Wrapping up its Week of Action Against The Wall, the local group Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid organized anti-Israel rallies at York University and the University of Toronto last week.

The CAIA, along with the Palestine Solidarity Committee and the Grassroots Anti-Imperialist Network, held a demonstration at York's Vari Hall on Nov. 16, and a march at U of T to "demand an end to Canadian complicity in Israeli apartheid," the CAIA website said.

According to the group's website, the U of T protest meant to target three sites on or near campus that it said have "direct links to Israeli Apartheid," namely the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, Hart House and the Israeli consulate on Bloor Street.

But Adam Hummel, president of Hillel at York, said the marchers at U of T didn't go near the Wolfond Centre.

"They did the march... They said they would gear up at the Wolfond Centre, but nothing happened."

Hummel said a lot of people on both sides of the Arab-Israeli conflict showed up for the rally at York, which was not authorized by the university and was organized by groups that are not recognized as student groups by the school.

Although there was a shouting match between students, York security was able to keep the two sides separated, Hummel said.

"They had speakers set up and they were shouting stuff, talking about the intifadah, but we just broke into a horah and started singing Hatikvah," he said.

The rally isn't the only recent example of anti-Israel or anti-Semitic sentiments at York.

Earlier this month, an elevator in the Keele campus' student centre was vandalized with stickers that read "Boycott Israeli Apartheid." The elevator was covered from top to bottom with 82 of the stickers, which were created by CAIA.

"This would be the worst and most aggressive type of hate postering that we've had in the 15 years the student centre has been open," Rob Castle, the centre's executive director, told Excalibur, York's student newspaper.

The stickers were removed, but the elevator was vandalized again the following day, Hummel said.

"In black marker, it was written 'Anti-Apartheid isn't anti-Semitism.' There were a few things [written]. It said, 'Zionism is Racism,' 'Hillel is a Racist Organization' and 'Israel is a racist state,'" he said.

Meanwhile, York student Britt Aharoni said she is filing a complaint with the university's ombudsperson and director of human rights, Fiona Crean, over comments made by another student in one of her classes.

During a discussion earlier this month in Aharoni's fourth-year global politics class about the nature of evil and the perception of Hitler, a student expressed hostility toward Jews and victims of the Holocaust.

Excalibur reported that the student said he held "the majority of Jews responsible for their tragedy for their failure to rise to arms" and that "six million Jews... catered to Nazi delight, tried to get along, or hid in the attic until they were finally collected off city streets and led to slaughter... The majority of Jewish people [affected] do not deserve the name hero or victim, they share in the guilt of the Holocaust with the Nazis."

Hummel said the atmosphere this year at York has been difficult.

"There is a lot of hostility, much more than last year. It's really bad this year. It's reaching some sort of climax," he said, citing pamphlets titled "Remember the Dead, Fight for the Living" that were distributed by anti-Israel advocates on campus during Holocaust and Genocide Awareness Week, an event organized by Hillel in early November.

"It sort of indirectly said that Hillel is a group that should not be responsible for organizing Holocaust or genocide awareness week because they support Israel," Hummel said.

He added that while being critical of Israel is not necessarily anti-Semitic, there is a fine line.

"When everything on campus is about Israel, when the only country in the world that's being criticized is Israel and when they absolutely refuse to look at any issues with the Palestinians, then it does become anti-Semitic," Hummel said. "As much as I don't like saying or feeling that, it does become uncomfortable for Jews, because when you walk through campus and see it every day, it makes you very uncomfortable."

Hummel said York's administration is aware of the problem and is working on ways to lessen the growing animosity of anti-Israel groups toward Jewish and pro-Israel campus groups.

"They aren't quite sure how to deal with it, because the anti-Israel groups who are responsible for the material about ending Israel are either just not registered as official groups on campus or they are just not interested in abiding by the rules of the school," he said.

Prof. Eric Lawee, associate director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said the problem is not limited to York.

"The left is anti-Israel. Campuses tend to be left-leaning... You have very virulent and, in many cases, unjustified anti-Israel expressions across campuses in North America, but of course it's much worse in Europe than it is in North America," he said.

Crean and CAIA did not return calls for comment.

Students welcome support after attack on Hillel

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Jewish students at the University of British Columbia arrived on campus Nov. 6 to find the front windows of their student centre, Hillel House, smashed by two large boulders.

But by week's end, they had participated in a roundtable discussion at Hillel House attended by police, campus security, Jewish communal leaders, university administration and students.

And Christian and Muslim chaplains also showed their support for what the Vancouver Hillel Foundation has called a hate crime – the third such anti-Semitic attack on Vancouver's Hillel House in three years.

"If there's a silver lining to this terrible incident, it's the outpouring of support and empathy that has come in to students, staff and lay leadership from all over the community," said Eyal Lichtmann, Hillel Vancouver's executive director.

"It's in times of grave injustice that the greatness of the human spirit often rises in response."

While students said the attack took an emotional toll, they were adamant that they wouldn't be intimidated. Holocaust Awareness Week began the day of the attack and continued without interruption.

But the incident certainly left some scars.

"We feel less threatened than violated," said Elysha Ames, UBC Hillel's student president. "This is more than just a building to us, it's our home, and especially for out-of-towners, this is their connection to Judaism. Hillel House is something special and personal to us."

Ron Boaz, president of Alpha Epsilon Pi, the Jewish fraternity on campus, agreed.

"I found it quite disconcerting, and I struggle to believe something like this can still happen on a university campus, which is fairly open-minded," he said.

"You wouldn't think students would be racist in their inclinations," he added. "I felt like this incident was a hit to my Jewishness, my heritage and my people."

The consensus at the roundtable was that members of the university community should plan more proactive events on campus to build tolerance, rather than reacting after something happens.

"We need to encourage students to think about these issues," said Pat Johnson, director of development and communications at Vancouver Hillel. "UBC has equity ambassadors that are already working on this, so it would mean joining forces with them.

"The idea is that the only way to address something like this in the long term is through public education campaigns."

U of T launches Jewish social work class

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The department of social work at the University of Toronto is launching a course like no other in Canada, said a social work professsor.

The course will explore the effect that Jewish culture and history has had on social service agencies in this country, Ernie Lightman said.

He said that the advisory committee to the Jewish studies program approached the dean of social work earlier this year about starting a master's program in Jewish social work.

Since then, Lightman and his colleagues have been busy creating a course set to begin in January 2007 that will teach master's-level students about the Jewish tradition of caring and social action within the context of social work, and prepare students to work for Jewish institutions.

"We're developing a course that is not just for Jewish students. It is a course that talks about what, if anything, makes Mount Sinai Hospital different from Toronto General Hospital? What makes Baycrest different from… any other residence for seniors?" Lightman said.

"Our course is specifically targeted towards the Jewish traditions of caring. Social work as a profession is one that was very heavily Jewish. At one time, our faculty was more than half Jewish. It is a field that Jews have traditionally gone into. So the question is, does this come out of our culture, our history, our traditions?"

Paula David, the co-ordinator of Baycrest Holocaust Resource program who teaches gerontology courses at Ryerson University, is the lead instructor of the new one-semester course called Jewish Perspectives on Caring, and hopes that U of T will consider turning it into a major.

Lightman said that if there is any school in Toronto where a course like this would succeed, it would be U of T.

"Last year, we started a collaborative initiative with the University of Haifa after the British boycott of the Israeli universities, and that was our department that did it," Lightman said.

"We're envisioning this as the first course that would eventually lead to a specialization. That is the hope here," David said.

"This is the first course that has integrated a clinical practice philosophy with a Jewish philosophical and practice-oriented base… It would be showing how one ethnic group has an impact on the larger community and society as well."

The course is designed so that students will be exposed to the perspectives of a number of professionals from different organizations within the Jewish community.

Lightman he said he hopes this elective, which can be taken by master's students at Ryerson and York University as well, will keep Canadian students from going to the United States for this kind of training.

Exhibit on small-town shul to open in Owen Sound

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After two years of gathering research and artifacts, Owen Sound's Beth Ezekiel Synagogue, Canada's last small-town shul, and Grey Roots, a Grey County heritage museum and visitor centre, are ready to introduce the Georgian Bay community to an exhibit called L'Chaim, the Story of Beth Ezekiel Synagogue.

Jeff Elie, Beth Ezekiel's president, said the exhibit will offer the community, both Jewish and non-Jewish, a glimpse into the history and culture of the Jewish community in Owen Sound, which has been present in the small town since the late 1800s.

"The exhibit takes the course of Jewish history right from the very beginning through to Beth Ezekiel Synagogue," Elie said.

"The exhibit is really geared for non-Jewish visitors, so there is a component that gives them a brief introduction to Judaism, and then it follows the course of Jewish history through to the development of the synagogue and then through to the Diaspora and how the synagogue in Owen Sound came about. From there, it tells Beth Ezekiel's story, which is one of growth and then decline and then rebirth."

Beth Ezekiel Synagogue

Owen Sound, which has a population of about 21,000, is the smallest Canadian town with an active synagogue.

Elie said that just a few years ago, the shul was struggling to stay afloat with a 13-family membership. Today, the congregation has tripled to more than 50 families.

Bob Greenberg, an emeritus professor of architecture at Ryerson University and the exhibit's historical consultant, said he remembers when there were fears the shul would have to close.

"About four years ago, the synagogue was barely there. It was just a ghost, but it was still there. People still came to services, and somehow it didn't disappear," Greenberg said.

Although Greenberg attributes the shul's rebirth to Elie, the shul president said that nothing would have been possible without the support of the wider Owen Sound community.

"We came very close to losing the synagogue, and we realized that the only way to save it was to go out to the community and ask for help. The response that we got was just overwhelming. It totally floored us how quickly the community stepped up to bat for us. That is largely responsible for the rebirth that we've experienced," Elie said.

"Owen Sound is very proud of its little synagogue. It is a pretty white community and having a synagogue here is important to them. I think they value it. I think they really treasure it."

The exhibit will feature background information, photos, artifacts, old prayer books, clothing and more, said Greenberg, who was responsible for presenting the research and artifacts in a comprehensive display and helped edit the gallery guidebook.

"We actually lent to the [Grey Roots] museum one of our Torahs. It will be on display. We found the original ark and bimah from before there was a Beth Ezekiel, before there was a synagogue in Owen Sound," Elie said.

"There was a Jewish community, and they would meet in rented accommodations above stores and here and there throughout town from the late 1800s. We found an ark and bimah and lectern that was in use and that will be on display."

Elie said that he is proud of the attention the shul has received because of the exhibit and thinks that it will add momentum to the shul's growth.

"I think where we succeeded was in getting and maintaining the support of the local community. The local community is very supportive of the synagogue, and that makes us feel good and makes us feel proud," he said.

"It has done a lot for the way we feel about being Jewish here in Owen Sound. It used to be that people were very quiet about being Jewish. There wasn't any anti-Semitism, but we just kept the synagogue off the radar."

He added that now, he gets many requests from church and school groups to tour the shul.

"People around here are really interested in learning more about Judaism, and the exhibit will give them the opportunity to do that," Elie said.

"It is important for the Jewish community in Owen Sound to recognize that it is a vibrant and existing, lively community. For the larger Jewish community, we showed that Judaism is a very large and universal religion and it isn't gathered in only a few urban places," Greenberg said.

L'Chaim, the Story of Beth Ezekiel Synagogue, will open to the public on Nov. 27 and is scheduled to run until February 2008.

Until Dec. 15, ticketholders will also have access to a travelling exhibit from Vancouver called Open Hearts, Closed Doors, which focuses on the lives of orphaned Holocaust survivors who made their way from displaced persons camps and orphanages to countries such as Canada.

Manitoba's Chief Justice subject of new exhibit

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Samuel Freedman, the subject of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's new exhibition, was a remarkable individual.

At an event held earlier this month to open the exhibit, which will run until Jan. 7, 2007, Manitoba's first Jewish judge and first Jewish chief justice, who died in 1993, was praised as a man of outstanding intellect and strong core values who also had a sharp wit. At the same time, speakers said, he remained humble and down to earth.

Close to 300 people came to the Berney Theatre at the Asper Community Campus to hear Freedman's virtues sung by some of the Jewish community's leading legal minds. Master of ceremonies Jack London, who was the University of Manitoba's first Jewish Dean of Law, recalled that, as a young law student in 1962, he was turned away from two major law firms because he was Jewish.

"Those were the dying days of restrictive anti-Semitism," he said. "Jewish lawyers were still ghettoized in smaller firms without access to clients in financial institutions. The Manitoba Club was still off limits to Jews. Sam Freedman broke the barrier at the Manitoba Club."

London explained that when Freedman was president of the Manitoba Bar Association, the tradition was for the association to hold meetings at the Manitoba Club. Freedman refused to hold any meetings there until the club allowed Jewish members. The policy was changed shortly thereafter.

"Before Sam, no one had thought to challenge these restrictive practices that we assumed were normal," London said. "He shone a beacon for us, pointing to a better future. He was a leader before he was appointed to the bench. He fought the good fight and won, so that we who followed would not have to fight."

Brian Schwartz, a University of Manitoba law professor, researcher and author, recalled Freedman as a jurist who could compress judgments into just a few words. "Samuel Freedman epitomized the talmudic dictum of saying little, doing much and greeting everyone with a smile," Schwartz said. "And he always found a way to balance the letter of the law and justice for the accused. He was a judicial virtuoso who believed strongly in the liberalism of the Enlightenment."

Arnold Naimark, who was the second Jewish President of University of Manitoba, got to know Freedman during the nine years (1959-68) that the judge was the university chancellor. He spoke of "Citizen Sam."

"There was hardly an organization to which Sam didn't contribute something of lasting value," Naimark recalled. "He was especially generous in accepting speaking engagements, no matter how large or small the group."

As university chancellor, Naimark noted, Freedman was a champion of governance reform and had a holistic vision of what higher education should be.

Community leader Harold Buchwald remembered Freedman as a mentor, colleague and travelling companion on frequent trips to Israel where they both served on the board of governors of the Hebrew University. He recounted examples of Freedman's humour.

While listening to a certain speaker for instance, Buchwald said, Freedman leaned over to a companion and whispered that not only didn't the speaker know what he was talking about, but it was also obvious he wasn't curious enough to learn about his topic.

The last speaker at the exhibit opening was Freedman's son, Martin, who followed his father's lead into law and the judiciary. Martin Freedman noted that his father was born in 1908 near Zhitomir in Ukraine, the son of Nathan and Ada Chasen (who, after coming to Winnipeg, changed the name to Freedman for reasons that remain unclear). Nathan came here first in 1909, followed by the rest of the family later.

Samuel Freedman grew up as one of seven brothers and sisters in the old north end. His parents always emphasized education. He entered the University of Manitoba as a scholarship student. (The scholarship was worth $100.) His original career goal was to become a professor of the classics. With that ambition unlikely to be fulfilled because he was Jewish, he chose law as a second option.

He married the former Brownie Udow, the only girl he ever dated, on Jan. 26, 1927. The couple had three children, Martin, and his sisters, Susan and Phyllis.

Martin remembered his father as hard working, determined, modest and always calm. "He taught us by example."

He noted that his father was never motivated by money. He also recalled that his father was not mechanically inclined in the least and didn't learn to drive a car until he was in his 40s.

The formal part of the evening concluded with a filmed interview that Samuel Freedman did with the CBC's John Harvard (now the lieutenant-governor of Manitoba) in 1983, on the day he retired from the court. Harvard introduced the documentary.

Freedman's widow, Brownie, and his children were on hand for the ribbon-cutting to launch the exhibition. Jewish Heritage Centre representatives noted that the exhibition was made possible because Brownie Freedman had kept copious records of her husband's career from the time they married until his death. She saved scrapbooks full of newspaper clippings, copies of speeches he made, awards he received and numerous photographs. She also kept a diary of their activities for over 20 years.

The exhibition organizers are encouraging anyone with anecdotes they want to share about Samuel Freedman to log onto www.jhcwc.org/samfreedmanstories.htm.

Ex-Israeli wins Young Entrepreneur Award in Alberta

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Arnon Levy, the founder of Guest-Tek Interactive Entertainment Ltd. founder, won the Business Development Bank of Canada's (BDC) Young Entrepreneur Award for Alberta last month.

Levy, 35, an Israeli immigrant who grew up in Calgary, just made the age cutoff for the award.

For the past 19 years, BDC, a financial institution owned by the government of Canada, has given out awards to successful entrepreneurs between the ages of 19 and 35 in each Canadian province.

This year's awards ceremony, called A World Without Boundaries, Open to New Markets, was held on Oct. 17 in Moncton, N.B. A committee determined the winners based on criteria including success, growth potential and innovation.

Guest-Tek is the first and only company that provides guests in hotel rooms all over the world a full network of technology services, Levy said.

"We provide Internet and other technology services to the hospitality industry. We provide high-speed Internet access to hotels, we provide digital videos, [movies and digital TV] and digital phone systems to hotel rooms… which is something that is incredibly popular these days."

But this multimillion-dollar business, which has offices in Calgary, Los Angeles, London, Rome and Buenos Aires, grew from humble beginnings.

Originally from Haifa, Levy and his family moved to the southwest area of Calgary, close to the Jewish community, when he was 10 years old.

After graduating from the University of Calgary with a bachelor of commerce degree, Levy started the business out of his basement 10 years ago.

"It was really about getting investors, friends and friends of family to invest in us, believe in the concept and the idea, and to slowly build the company off a strong reputation, and then take advantage of the opportunities that came along," Levy said.

Aron Levy

"For us, our first big cheque came in 2001 from the Hyatt hotel group and that's what really got this thing off the ground."

He said there were times when he experienced doubt that his business would succeed, but he never gave up.

"We definitely had our moments when we thought it wouldn't take off, but I always knew that I would keep working my butt off to make sure that it succeeded. But overall, there was confidence throughout the whole process," Levy said.

Today, Guest-Tek is a 300-person-strong business that went public two years ago.

In 2005, Guest-Tek, which is listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange, made $44 million, doubling the previous year's revenues.

Levy is also the Ernst and Young Entrepreneur of the Year this year, after being nominated three times for that award. He said this is the first time he's been nominated for the BDC award, and is honoured by the acknowledgement.

"It is an incredible honour for us. I think that there isn't a greater honour for an entrepreneur. This is a country that I love and I love living here and I love what this country has offered me," Levy said.

"To be awarded by the federal government this way is a fantastic honour, and I appreciate the fact that I can be part of this nation and the opportunities that arise here."

Markham's Erin Shapero wins on strong environmental platform

"We're introducing a green bin into our system, so all organics can be recycled out of the landfill cycle," he said.

He will also pay special attention to Jewish constituents, he said.

"I take that as a very significant responsibility," Shefman said. "[I will] help educate my colleagues and staff [to] understand the needs and diversity of the Jewish community."

Across the way in Markham Ward 2, Erin Shapero won a resounding 83 per cent of the vote on a strong environmental platform.

The 31-year-old will start her third term on council with one clear goal: "To make Markham the most environmentally sustainable community in the GTA," Shapero said.

She will also advocate for more youth and women getting involved in politics.

"I'm the first Jewish woman ever elected to Markham council," she said. "And I've been the only Jew and woman on council for the past six years."

This year, Shapero passed a motion to bar council meetings on Yom Kippur and will continue to foster positive race relations on council and in her ward.

In Richmond Hill (Ward 3), David Cohen beat Natalie Helferty, seizing 62 per cent of the vote, and will serve his seventh consecutive term on council.

Cohen, who sits on numerous subcommittees and is a volunteer board member with Reena, will stay abreast of Jewish affairs.

"Richmond Hill has a growing Jewish population," Cohen said. "And I expect there will be more Jewish issues in the coming years."

Jewish school trustees will also dot the political landscape this term.

In Toronto, Jason Pasternak, trustee-elect for York Centre (Ward 5), will start his first term after winning 53 per cent of the vote.

He promised to address the Toronto District School Board's $84-million deficit.

"We need a new funding formula and get compensated for exponentially rising infrastructure costs," Pasternak said.

Pasternak says he will also look into joint initiatives to bridge the public and Jewish school systems.

"There are opportunities for community outreach," he said. "All parents, whether their kids go to the public or Jewish school system… there are opportunities to share ideas and resources."

In the Eglinton-Lawrence riding (Ward 8), Howard Goodman won re-election with a convincing 63 per cent of the vote.

Goodman, writing to The CJN via e-mail, echoed Pasternak's call for more funding, and he also urged increased co-operation among TDSB trustees.

One of his major objectives going forward will be to "reduce the amount of partisan political games among trustees and focus on changes within our budget that would benefit students," he wrote.

He will also champion tolerance among his constituents.

"TDSB Jewish students… will be better protected from exclusion and harassment," he wrote. "I will continue to work with organizations like Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal, [Canadian Jewish Congress], Roots of Empathy, and Future Aces to achieve this goal."

To the south, Josh Matlow was returned for a second term as trustee for St. Paul's (Ward 11), capturing 45 per cent of the vote.

The 30-year-old environmental advocate, teacher and writer will focus on school zoning issues, specifically on fixing random demarcation lines that he says separate childhood friends as they progress through the system.

"In many cases, you see kids who have grown up together forced to go to different schools at a time in their lives where [their] whole world is [their] friends," Matlow said. "So we need to give parents choices."

Matlow will also promote his "Eco-schools" initiative, whereby all schools would teach students how to be stewards of the environment.

Over in Don Valley West (Ward 13), Gerri Gershon won a hard-fought battle against James McQueen, winning by just 1,053 votes. It was her eighth election.

The 21-year trustee said she'll focus on improving student achievement and engagement.

She also acknowledged financial challenges facing her ward.

"We're facing a big deficit again," Gershon said. "We'll be looking to improve the funding formula and looking at our own house to see where we can restructure and save some money. We have some difficult decisions to make."

School trustees north of Toronto also have their work cut out for them.

Susan Geller, trustee-elect for Markham (wards 1 and 2), won her first term by 3,101 votes over closest rival Stan Korolnek.

Geller, a chartered accountant, plans to use her skills in auditing and budgeting to help her school board colleagues.

"I think I have the knowledge to help," she said. "I will be looking to balance the budget and achieve fiscal responsibility and transparency."

But with regard to students, "money isn't everything" she said.

In Vaughan-Thornhill (wards 4 and 5), Joel Hertz returned as trustee with 38 per cent of the vote.

On his agenda are plans to build more schools in York Region to serve increasing education demands.

"We've got a lot of little kids in Thornhill and we've got to keep up," Hertz said.

Another issue Hertz will work on is program accessibility for students.

"Because of the large area we cover we have… kids being bused too long for specialty programs like French immersion," he said. "We need to move some of the programs around instead of the kids."

REMEMBERING THE PAST: Ted Winick, a member of the Royal Canadian Legion, Branch 344, shares stories about the importance of Remembrance Day with Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School students, from left, Erin Silverberg, Cooper Godel and David Klein. Accompanying them is trumpeter Samantha Clarke, who performed in the school's assembly.

Clinton praises Canada's role in Afghanistan

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Former U.S. president Bill Clinton praised Canada for sending troops to Afghanistan and thanked Canadians for their continued friendship with the United States at a JNF fundraising dinner earlier this month.

[Sam Garcia photo]

Speaking Nov. 8 to a sold-out crowd of 1,100 people at the annual Jewish National Fund dinner, which this year honoured Ottawa lawyer and community activist Stephen Victor, Clinton stressed his warm ties to Canada.

"We all want to see a genuine moderate Muslim government in Afghanistan... I know this has been a painful sacrifice for you... I know this is an agony for you... I don't think we should walk away from Afghanistan if we have any chance of having a moderate Muslim democracy that is against the Taliban," he said.

Clinton also spoke of his friendship with the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and the work they did together to bring about peace in the Middle East.

"This is always a very sad week for me, because Nov. 5 was the anniversary of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination and I loved him so much, and had he lived I am convinced we would have had a lasting peace in the Middle East by 1998," Clinton said.

Former prime minister Jean Chrétien also attended the dinner, as did Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker; former deputy prime minister Herb Gray; MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler; Supreme Court justices Rosalie Abella and Morris Fish, and many other dignitaries.

Lisa Cogan, president of JNF Ottawa, said the dinner raised $1,100,000 for the Stephen and Gail Victor Botanical Garden at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"Gail and I chose this project – the Botanical Garden, on Mount Scopus, in Jerusalem, because we believe that the enemies of the Jewish people, the enemies of Israel, will not succeed," Stephen Victor said. "We have faith in the strength, wisdom and moral power of the Jewish people. We have faith in the strength, wisdom and moral power of Israel."

He added: "Just as the plants and flora of the Botanical Garden are rooted in the ground of Mount Scopus, the Jewish people are rooted, firmly fixed, to Mount Scopus, to Jerusalem, the eternal capital of the Jewish people, and to the land of Israel, the eternal home of the Jewish people."

LIEL VISITS BIALIK: Israeli singing sensation Liel, centre, delighted students at Bialik Hebrew Day School with a special performance prior to her Toronto debut concert earlier this month. Accompanied by Bialik's choir, shown with Liel, she sang for students in grades 3 to 8. She later answered questions about her career and her inspiration as a songwriter.

Wiesel says no to Israeli presidency

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Elie Wiesel says he's not interested in becoming president of Israel.

When asked at a Montreal press conference last week about Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's suggestion that he succeed embattled Israeli President Moshe Katsav, the Nobel peace laureate, who seemed amused by the idea, said he wants to continue to speak freely and not be constrained by a mainly ceremonial public office.

"I am a professor, a writer. The president does not have a political function. He has no power. As a free man, I can do much more to bring peace to the Middle East," he said.

Olmert made the surprise suggestion last month that Wiesel was a possible candidate to replace Katsav, who may soon face rape and sexual assault charges.

Wiesel – a Boston University professor who is best known for the autobiographical book Night, about his experiences in the Holocaust – recalled that physicist Albert Einstein turned down David Ben-Gurion's invitation to become Israel's first president, in part, because he did not speak Hebrew.

Wiesel said he does know the language, but having never lived in Israel, he's not the best choice.

He also repeated his earlier call for Iran to be excluded from the United Nations as long as president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is in power.

He said the Iranian leader should be "declared persona non grata. Iran today represents a real danger, threatening not only Israel, but the whole world."

He described Ahmadinejad as "morally degraded."

"He denies the Holocaust, but he says that that will come. He freely affirms that Iran intends to destroy the State of Israel."

Wiesel, a Romanian Holocaust survivor, drew a capacity audience of more than 1,300 mainly non-Jewish university students at the Spectrum in downtown Montreal for a lecture in French titled "Building a Moral Society."

During his speech he deplored fanaticism. While he has devoted his life to the promotion of human rights, he said he doesn't support groups that use violence to attain them, among whom he includes the Palestinians.

His appearance was sponsored by a consortium, spearheaded by Hillel, of some 20 student and young adults' organizations, that cut across religious and linguistic lines. They included the McGill Muslim Students' Association, the Newman Catholic Centre, Le Forum Jeunesse de l'Ile de Montréal, the Université du Québec à Montréal-affiliated L'Institut de Nouveau Monde, and SHOUT (Students Helping Others Understand Tolerance).

Elie Wiesel

Wiesel praised the ecumenical nature of the project, and offered it as a model for others.

"Christian, Muslim and Jewish students working together is an act of hope. We should build on it. If it can be done here, why not elsewhere? It's an example to other universities and communities," he said.

He urged young people to get involved in international humanitarian crises, such as ending the conflict in the Darfur region of Sudan. Just signing petitions in sufficient numbers can have an effect, he said.

If every university student in Quebec signed a petition, it could not be ignored by governments and the United Nations, he added.

A "mistake" was made more than 40 years ago in not including Muslims as a "third partner" in the interfaith dialogue that opened between Catholics and Jews after the Second Vatican Council, Wiesel said, and he advocated extending the invitiation to Muslims now.

"It is never too late, but it is late," he said.

Asked if it's time to do something about building a moral society and not just discuss it, Wiesel quickly replied that "discussing is doing something."

הכביש הישראלי

היתי בשבוע שעבר בארץ, נהגתי בזהירות יתר בצד ימין של הכביש, חשש לחיי, וראיתי איך מתנהגים הישראלים על הכביש. ואחר כך קראתי בעתון כתבה שאמרה: עם שנהג כך, בחסר משמעת מינימאלית, בפראות ופזיזות כל כך בוטות, בלי לאותת ובלי לתת סימן כלשהו על שינוי מסלולים- מה הפלא שהוא מתנהג באותה צורה בצאתו למלחמה, בחוסר דאגה לבטחון חיילו הצעירים והמבוגרים, בחוסר כבוד לחיי אדם. הלא הכל בא מאותו מקום-לזול כללי בזולת, אלא אם כן הזולת הוא במקרה אחיך או חברך מהצבא. כל השאר-על הראסי.

במשאל שערך בשבוע שעבר, ענו 95 אחוז נשאלים ישראלים שבעייה מספר אחת עבורם היא הבטיחות בדרכים, יותר מאשר הטרור שזכה לתשעים אחוז.

ג'ורג' וואשינגטון אמר שלכל עם יש את הממשלה שהוא ראוי לה. בישראל מרבים כולם להתלונן על הפוליטיקאים שאתראים למצב הקיים. אבל יד על הלב-כולם מתנהגים כמו הפוליטיקאים, והכביש הוא רק דוגמא אחת לכך. אבל שישאר בינינו.

הינה קטע:

"אנחנו לא נשכב בערב במיטה עם מגבת על הראש ונאמר לילדינו שאנחנו נשארים רק בשבילם. לא, אנחנו נתנהל באהבה ובשקט, מתוך כבוד הדדי, נהלך על ריצוף השיש של בתי המדות שלנו. לעולם לא נקרא לבן זוגנו כלומניק או קוּרְבָּה...."

German auctioneers drop looted Stern art sale

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A German auction house withdrew from sale two Old Master paintings that the late Jewish art dealer Max Stern was forced to sell by the Nazis, but only after Stern's estate repeatedly protested.

The Van Ham auction house in Cologne was scheduled to put two works by 17th-century Dutch Baroque painter Mathijs Naiveu up for bids on the morning of Nov. 17, but cancelled less than 24 hours before.

The Stern estate, whose beneficiaries are Concordia and McGill universities and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, was informed Nov. 7 by the London-based Art Loss Register that the works had come on the market. There are presently more than 250 former Stern holdings listed with that private database of lost and stolen art. The estate, through the New York State Banking Department's Holocaust Claims Processing Office, immediately requested that the paintings be withdrawn. Clarence Epstein, who heads the Concordia-based Stern restitution project, said Van Ham initially refused and asked for more information on the paintings' provenance.

"The estate is most disturbed by the fact that Van Ham accepted to offer these works without providing any provenance information whatsoever, in particular without noting the Stern restitution claim attached to them. Van Ham was well aware of the tainted history of these paintings," said Epstein, who described Van Ham as a well-established auction house.

After the matter went back and forth over a few days without resolution, Epstein said the estate went to the European media, and it would appear the reports, particularly in the German press, prompted the auction house to drop the sale.

The consigner, however, has shown no willingness to relinquish the paintings to the Stern estate, which claims to be the rightful owner.

The identity of the consignor is not known, except that the individual is a German national. The estate dealt with that individual through a lawyer, Epstein said.

Epstein said the estate is now attempting to change the "possessor's" mind and is hoping Van Ham will assist in the effort to restore the works to the estate.

Market Scene in the Piazza Navona (1691) and Market Scene in the Piazza del Quirinale (1698) were sold "under duress" by Stern, who owned an art gallery in Dusseldorf, in 1937, Epstein said.

They were not part of the collection of more than 200 works auctioned off by Lempertz later in November of that year, which was the final liquidation of Stern's inventory before he fled Germany for Britain. After World War II began, Stern was interned as an enemy alien because of his German nationality and then deported to an internment camp in Quebec in 1941.

Upon his release the following year, he joined one of Canada's most prominent art houses, the Dominion Gallery, and a few years later became its sole owner until his death in 1987.

Epstein said the two paintings were among the early pieces that the restitution project identified as among the up to 400 works Stern is believed to have been forced to sell at prices well below their value between 1935 and 1937.

The estate has been pursuing the paintings since they surfaced in 2002. The same consignor tried to sell them through Sotheby's in Amsterdam. When its research confirmed the works' tainted past, that auction house refused to sell them.

Epstein said documentary evidence has been discovered since then that "irrefutably" proves that the paintings had belonged to Stern. In any event, he said it is generally accepted that art sold by Jewish dealers in Germany during this prewar period was done under duress.

The pair were valued a few years ago at close to $50,000 (US).

Ottawa's only Reform shul marks 40 years

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A weekend of festivities earlier this month celebrated the 40th anniversary of Temple Israel, Ottawa's first and only Reform synagogue.

The active congregation of more than 400 families began with a handful of people in 1965, when the Canadian Council of Liberal Congregations called a meeting of interested local residents in the hope of establishing a local presence.

Early members met in a variety of venues, including hotels, the Histadrut Centre and the Montefiore Club. In 1971, the congregation purchased the James Street Synagogue when its membership amalgamated with the Orthodox Beth Shalom Synagogue. A year later, the building was destroyed by fire, and the congregation was once again on the move, borrowing space wherever it could.

Finally, in October 1975, Temple Israel was able to move into a brand new building, which still stands on Prince of Wales Drive.

Rabbi Steve Garten, who has been Temple Israel's spiritual leader since 1995, describes the congregation's founding philosophy.

"Its inclusive nature was developed in order to say that married or unmarried, childbearing or childless, men or women, all would be offered an equal opportunity to worship the God of Israel in a welcoming community."

Each committee at the temple – such as its social action and youth groups – is expected to plan at least one activity connected to the anniversary.

"There will be many anniversary-themed activities throughout the year," said temple member Merle Haltrecht-Matte, the 40th anniversary co-ordinator.

"We are also going to be producing a quilt wall hanging, which will involve many hands in its making."

Designed by Claire Cohen, the background is expected to be the Wailing Wall, "and people will be encouraged to purchase a brick where their name will be drawn," Haltrecht-Matte said.

The special weekend of events, held Nov. 10 to 12, included an Oneg Shabbat honouring past presidents of the temple.

Bill Danson, the first president of what was then called the Jewish Reform Congregation of Ottawa and the honorary chair of the 40th anniversary weekend, expressed satisfaction at seeing students from the first religious school take up positions of leadership.

"The place is run by the kids!" he joked.

A service on Saturday, Nov. 11, Remembrance Day, honoured member veterans. The guest rabbi, Dan Danson, was himself a former "temple kid."

The weekend was capped off by a gala dinner dance on Saturday night at Algonquin College. Attendees watched the premiere showing of "See How We Grow: 40 Years Revisited," a DVD about the temple's history that was produced with the assistance of a grant from the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society.

Letting male officers deal with Chassidim just a suggestion, say Montreal police

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It's all a misunderstanding, the Montreal police department says.

There was no directive that female officers step aside and allow their male colleagues to handle interventions with chassidic men, Insp. Paul Chablo, head of media relations, told The CJN.

He said it was a "suggestion" and comparable to the police trying to respect a sexual-assault victim's request to speak to a female officer, for example.

The chassidic communities, meanwhile, say don't blame them; they never made a request for special treatment by the police and there have been no problems.

What was intended to enlighten the force about the customs and beliefs of Chassidim in order for officers not to misunderstand certain behaviours has been taken by the police union as undermining the equality of male and female officers on the job.

Even Public Security Minister Jacques Dupuis demanded an explanation from the police department director after the issue was raised in the national assembly by the opposition Parti Québécois.

The controversy was touched off by an article in the October issue of an internal police department newsletter called L'heure juste. The department's inter-cultural relations division has been running a series on the city's different ethnic and religious communities to sensitize the force to cultural differences.

Insp. Johanne Paquin, who is in charge of formulating the department's strategy on inter-cultural relations, defended the recommendation as realistic and stressed the need for officers to understand the people they serve.

The article said that if a female officer has difficulty communicating with a chassidic male or if he refuses to make eye contact, it should not be interpreted as disrespect or resistance, but as a reflection of the communities' beliefs about appropriate interactions between men and women.

"This was absolutely not a directive, or meant as an insult to female officers," Chablo said. "It was simply a tool to better understand Jewish customs. It's telling them, 'Don't be surprised if he doesn't look at you.' All it's suggesting is that, in certain cases, it may be better to let a male colleague intervene."

Chablo added that he is surprised the Police Brotherhood has interpreted the article in the way it has, because similar information has been given to the force about Muslim customs concerning relations between men and women.

Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Outremont Chassidic Organizations, commended the police department for its efforts to sensitize officers.

"But we never said we can't talk to policewomen… I'm not saying there has never been a problem, but I have very close relations with the police and have never heard a word."

Frisking by an officer of a different gender is another matter, he said, but an understanding already exists about the need to avoid such situations, just as it does at airports with security officials.

The newsletter offers the hypothetical situation of a police duo arriving at a bakery at the corner of Hutchison and St. Viateur streets, the heart of the chassidic area, to investigate a reported robbery. The Jewish clerk is questioned by the female officer, but directs his answers to her male colleague and never looks at her.

The article explains that this is normal, because "according to the Torah, the holy book of the Jews, men should not fraternize with women." The author says that sometimes there is no choice but to let the male officer take over.

Police Brotherhood president Yves Francoeur said he was surprised by the recommendation. "It's completely absurd that our policewomen do not have the right to the same respect as men. We are in Canada after all."

Dupuis said in the national assembly that female officers should not have to defer to their male colleagues to accommodate the religious beliefs of Chassidim because gender equality is "a fundamental value of our society."

He made the comment during question period after PQ member Jocelyne Caron described the recommendation as discriminatory and a hindrance to female officers' ability to carry out their duties.

Jewish organizations applauded the Canadian votes

The resolution was adopted by a vote of 32 in favour, eight against and six abstaining. Joining Canada in opposing the resolution were the Czech Republic, Finland, Germany, Netherlands, Poland, Romania and the United Kingdom.

France, Guatemala, Japan, Republic of Korea, Switzerland and Ukraine abstained.

Supporters of the resolution included more than a dozen Muslim countries, as well as Argentina, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, India, Mexico, Peru, the Philipines, Russia, Sri Lanka and Uruguay.

Speaking prior to the Geneva vote, Canadian envoy Paul Meyer said Canada viewed the violence in the Gaza Strip with concern, and he urged the Jewish state "to act with restraint and take all measures possible to protect civilians."

He noted that Israel had expressed regret at the incident. "At the same time, Canada recognized that rocket attacks against Israel must stop, and the Palestinian Authority must take concrete measures to address Israel's security concerns and eliminate attacks against Israel.

"Unfortunately, neither this session of the council nor the draft resolution presented took into consideration the respective roles and responsibilities of all parties, and thus was not constructive in promoting the human rights and fundamental freedoms of everyone in the region, the rule of law and ultimately encouraging the widely agreed goal of securing long-term peace and stability in the Middle East."

In New York, senior Canadian UN envoy Alan Bowman explained Canada's abstention on the General Assembly resolution by noting the resolution on Palestinian self-determination did not adequately address the responsibilities of both parties in the conflict.

Jewish organizations applauded the Canadian votes, while a group of Liberal parliamentarians in Ottawa called on Canada to withdraw from the Human Rights Council, which it termed "a flawed body."

Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel co-chair Anita Neville said, "Like its predecessor the United Nations Commission on Human Rights [UNCHR], the newly created UN Human Rights Council is proving to be nothing other than a vehicle for Israel denouncers."

Withdrawing from the United Nations Human Rights Council would be the natural response to Canada's statement to the United Nations General Assembly plenary in 2005, when Canada urged a new process be developed, one that was "free of divisive rhetoric, accurate, detailed in approach and balanced in outcome," Neville stated in a news release.

"The United Nations has failed to heed the call of Canada," said Senator David Smith, co-chair of the parliamentary group. "Trying to work from within to correct a broken system has not worked, and has made Canada seem to be a willing participant in this charade of a process. The time for serious UN reform is now, and in order to prove to the international community how committed Canada is to this reform, it is imperative that the Conservative government withdraw from the council until serious, legitimate, and viable reform is done at the United Nations and its human rights council."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said the Geneva vote reaffirmed that Canada was seeking fairness and balance in UN resolutions affecting Israel, while B'nai Brith Canada applauded the government's "principled stand."

In Geneva, Hillel Neuer of UN Watch said the Human Rights Council seems to be reprising the role of the UNCHR, which was criticized for having too many human rights violators as members and focusing disproportionately on Israel while ignoring abuses around the world.

Neuer noted that the council had held two regular sessions and three special sessions since it was inaugurated in June, all focusing exclusively on Israel. It adopted resolutions critical of Israel in all three special sessions and in one of the regular meetings.

In a speech before the council plenary, Neuer said the most recent resolution ignored the wilful killing of Israeli civilians by Palestinian groups, including the Qassam attack that killed Fatima Slutzker in Sderot and severely wounded others.

"Meanwhile, the council has not had a special session or passed a resolution on… the grave human rights abuses that have been occurring in Darfur, Sudan, and now are spreading to Chad," he said. In the previous 10 days, hundreds of Chadian civilians had been killed by Arab militias.

Neuer told The CJN that in the absence of Australia and the United States, Canada had become the most pro-Israel member of the council.

Sara Saber-Freedman, CIC's chief operating officer, said Canada is applying at the UN Human Rights Council the principles expressed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper at the Francophonie summit in Romania last July. At that time, Israel and Hezbollah were at war, and Harper said Canada would not support a motion that recognized only Lebanese casualties while ignoring Israeli suffering.

Saber-Freedman suggested Canada is adopting a principled position at the United Nations that focuses on fairness and balance. She urged other federal parties to support the government decision to vote against the resolution.

In Israel, officials said they would fully co-operate with Arbour, though they denounced the UN for adopting a one-sided resolution that ignored Palestinian terrorism.

Arbour said she will speak with Palestinian and Israeli leaders during her five-day visit to the region and urge them to stop violence and protect civilians.

She said the primary purpose of her visit was "to emphasize the obligation to protect civilians during armed confrontation, and the entitlement of all, Palestinians and Israelis alike, to live free from fear, free from want and free from harm."

She was expected to visit the town of Sderot, the target for hundreds of Qassam rockets fired from the Gaza Strip, as well as to meet senior Israeli officials.

Israeli officials blast UN resolution on Gaza

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel and the United Nations are at loggerheads once again.

A UN General Assembly resolution last Friday deplored civilian deaths in a recent Israeli artillery barrage in the Gaza Strip and stirred ire in Jerusalem on Sunday as officials grappled with ways to stop Palestinian rocket salvoes.

"We have no doubt that it is the State of Israel which must respond to attacks on civilians," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet. "But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to see fit to initiate a resolution in condemnation of those who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a long-range, systematic policy."

Friday's resolution, which was passed by a vote of 156-7 with six abstentions, deplored the Nov. 8 shelling of Beit Hanoun, in which 19 civilians died. It called for a UN probe and for Israel's immediate withdrawal of troops from the Gaza Strip.

While the resolution was non-binding, it underscored for many Israelis a sense of tacit international support for the Palestinians and indifference to the Jewish state's efforts to contain the conflict.

"Israel withdrew a year ago from Gaza, has deployed its forces on the border with Gaza, was hailed by the whole international community for this step. It has been attacked time and again from Gaza by Palestinians," said Tourism Minister Isaac Herzog.

"We cannot accept in any shape or manner the capability to attack Israel from across the border from Gaza. Any sane nation would do the same, and the UN condemnation is outrageous," Herzog said.

Justice Minister Meir Sheetrit accused the United Nations of hypocrisy.

"How come that Israel, which is the victim of attacks, hundreds of rocket attacks from Gaza at Sderot, Ashkelon and other cities, does not warrant even a discussion in the United Nations?" he asked.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, sounding a rare positive note, said the General Assembly vote appeared to be little more than a frustrated response to the failure of Qatar to get a resolution condemning Israel passed by the UN Security Council. That bid was torpedoed last week by the United States, which cast a veto.

Political sources said that Israel, which already ruled the Beit Hanoun incident a regrettable accident, was unlikely to co-operate with a UN investigation if one is undertaken.

But Olmert cautioned his cabinet colleagues that, given the security situation in Gaza, there was no guarantee such a tragedy would not happen again.

"If anyone has a better way for dealing with the Qassams, let's hear it," he was quoted as having said behind closed doors.

There was no reported response, though Defence Minister Amir Peretz did say he was trying to restart a shelved plan to develop a system that would shoot down the incoming rockets. Having a capable system would take years, security sources said.

Hezbollah units returning to border: IDF

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Exactly three months after a UN-brokered ceasefire ended Israel's war in Lebanon, Israel Defence Forces officers told the Jerusalem Post last week that Hezbollah gunmen disguised as civilians were back on the border and collecting intelligence on IDF positions.

Although 15,000 Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) and 8,000 UN Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) soldiers were deployed in southern Lebanon, between the border and the Litani River, the IDF said Hezbollah still had a presence in the area.

"They [Hezbollah] are still there," an officer in the Northern Command said. "We are watching them and they are watching us."

Armed Hezbollah men, the officer said, were no longer along the border as they were before the war, when Hezbollah maintained military outposts right next to Israel.

But he said Hezbollah operatives lived in villages along the border and were spotted conducting surveillance on Israel.

"They are there, but they cannot operate freely like they used to," the officer said. "There is UNIFIL and the LAF there, and this does complicate things for them."

UNIFIL rejected IDF allegations that Hezbollah guerrillas had returned to the border. The UN force's chief liaison officer, Col. Alexan Lalan, told the Post that the IDF's actions, in particular the daily Israeli Air Force flyovers, were strengthening Hezbollah and creating new militants for the Shiite group.

"The flyovers harm the credibility of UNIFIL, the credibility of the LAF and the credibility of the state of Lebanon," Lalan said in a phone interview from his office in the southern Lebanese town of Naqoura.

"Every flyover creates new Hezbollah militants and new sympathy for Hezbollah since it shows and demonstrates that UNIFIL and the LAF are not powerful and able to stop them," Lalan said.

Following the ceasefire that went into effect on Aug. 14, UNIFIL set up a liaison office in Northern Command headquarters in Safed and stationed several officers there. Lalan said the officers were responsible for maintaining a good "flow of information" between the IDF and UNIFIL.

Milos Strugar, spokesperson for the UN, could not confirm IDF claims that weapons were being smuggled into Lebanon from Syria – the justification for the continued IAF flyovers – but said Hezbollah was no longer present in UNIFIL's area of operations in southern Lebanon.

"UNIFIL is not deployed along the border with Syria and therefore we do not know what happens there," he said. "In our area of operations, there is no physical presence of Hezbollah armed people, and on a few occasions UNIFIL came across weapons and [Hezbollah] assets and we informed the Lebanese army and they came and destroyed them."

An IDF officer said he thought the Lebanese army would prevent Hezbollah from taking up arms and returning to the border in the same numbers as before the war. "The Lebanese government does not want to repeat the events of this past summer," the officer said. "To ensure this, they need to enforce their sovereignty in southern Lebanon."

Meanwhile, a recent UN report has revealed that more than 700 Somalian combatants aided Hezbollah during the war in Lebanon, the New York Times reported last week.

According to the report, the Somalian fighters received training and weapons from Hezbollah via Iran and Syria in return for their help, thus assisting the Islamic forces in Somalia in their battle to control their country.

Though it was unclear how the information was acquired, if proven true, this would be the first sign that Hezbollah received foreign assistance during the war this past summer.

The UN report also mentioned Iran, saying the country had tried to procure uranium from Somalia in exchange for weapons; however, it was unclear whether the transaction was successful.

An unnamed Israeli official at the UN denied any knowledge of Somalian involvement in the war with Hezbollah.

Hezbollah officials could not be reached for comment.

Israel can't tolerate a nuclear Iran, Olmert tells GA

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

LOS ANGELES — As the annual United Jewish Communities (UJC) General Assembly came to a close last week, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged that Israel will not back down from stopping Iran from becoming a nuclear power.

"We cannot tolerate – we will not tolerate – those who challenge Israel's right to exist while actively seeking to develop the catastrophic weapons to fulfil their goals," said Olmert, who met with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington D.C., before arriving in Los Angeles to address the North American Jewish community for the first time since the start of the Israel-Hezbollah war.

Olmert urged the international community to act against the Iranian nuclear threat, saying that failure to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear power is not an option.

"It would be an unbearable sin to future generations to allow Iran to obtain nuclear weapons. What would we tell our children? How can we justify not preventing this catastrophic event? If Iran achieves the ability to produce nuclear weapons, as we know it is seeking to do, we will enter a new era of instability unlike any the world has ever seen," Olmert said.

Addressing more than 5,000 delegates from North American and Israel at the 75th annual GA, Olmert also spoke about the recent war with Hezbollah, briefly touching on Israel's successes and failures.

He also promised Karnit Goldwasser, the wife of kidnapped soldier Ehud Goldwasser, that he would do "the utmost" to bring him, as well as fellow captive soldiers Gilad Shalit and Eldad Regev, back home.

(Two nights earlier at the opening plenary, where Israeli Foreign Affairs Minister Tzipi Livni was the keynote speaker, Goldwasser made an emotional plea to GA delegates to raise their voices and pressure the international community to help free the captive soldiers.)

Referring to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Olmert said that if there is ever going to be peace between the two peoples, there must be dialogue.

"Here and again I declare, I am willing to meet [Palestinian Authority] Chairman [Mahmoud] Abbas immediately, without any preconditions, to discuss with him means for creating progress for our two peoples and hope for a better future in our region," Olmert said.

He said that Israelis and Palestinians must make a choice.

"We can embrace hope, and together we will revitalize our two peoples and the entire region, providing for our children the opportunity and prosperity that only comes with security and understanding. Or we can be gripped by fear and conflict in which we ruin not only ourselves but the future for generations to come," Olmert said.

"Let me be clear. Israel chooses hope. Israel chooses peace," he said, adding that Israel can't accept a Palestinian government led by an organization, Hamas, that denies Israel's existence.

During Olmert's speech, steps away from the Los Angeles Convention Centre, where the four-day conference was held, roughly 100 people protested the prime minister's appearance.

Holding signs that read "Occupation is a crime," and chanting "Bush, Olmert, you can hide, we charge you with genocide," the protesters were held at bay by the Los Angeles Police Department.

During his address, Olmert also took the time to thank UJC for raising some $350 million (US) since the start of the war, and he emphasized the importance to Israel of having the support of North American Jews.

"To all of you who made a pilgrimage to Israel in the midst of the fighting, your presence reassured me and the entire population of Israel that Israelis and the Jewish Diaspora share unbreakable bonds of allegiance," he said.

"We are one people. We have one heritage. We share one future, a future which we create together."

While Olmert's speech ended on an optimistic note, the night before, the leader of Israel's opposition, Likud leader and former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, used his time at the podium to urge the international community to believe Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad when he threatens to wipe Israel off the map.

Netanyahu said that Iran today is like Nazi Germany in the 1930s.

"It is 1938 and Iran is Germany and it is racing to acquire nuclear weapons," Netanyahu said, repeating this line throughout his speech.

But, he warned, while Israel is Iran's first target, it's not Iran's only target.

"Iran's nuclear program, and its missile program, goes well beyond the destruction of Israel. It goes to the creation of a system that will be geared up to produce 25 bombs a year, within a decade, 250 bombs," he said.

"They've got a missile program that within 10 to 15 years will reach the Eastern seaboard of the United States."

Netanyahu said that world leaders don't understand the global threat posed by Iran.

"They think this is a Jewish problem. They think that the militant Islamists hate the West because of Israel. They've hated the West for hundreds of years before there was an Israel. In fact, they don't hate the West because of Israel, they hate Israel because of the West. Because we represent a liberal civilization."

The bottom line, Netanyahu said, is that Iran's nuclear ambitions must be stopped. "The Holocaust taught us something. No one will defend the Jews if the Jews do not defend themselves."

Addressing GA delegates after Netanyahu, Canadian MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler echoed his sentiments and offered a North American perspective on the Iranian threat.

"There is no reason why we can't bring the leaders of Iran before the international criminal court and hold them accountable for genocidal intent," Cotler said.

He said that people often say the root of the Mideast conflict is the Israeli occupation, or that Israel is an apartheid state.

"It is time for us to take back the narrative," Cotler said. "Israel and the Jewish people are the only state in the world today and the only people in the world today that are the standing object of an existential threat from Iran and a terrorist threat from all its surrogates."

Cotler said that supporting Israel is not necessarily a Jewish cause.

"I come to the support of Israel, not simply because it is a Jewish cause, but because it is a profoundly just cause, a cause for all Americans and all Canadians."

Cross-border trade a small sign of hope

Israel's 80-kilometre-long border with Syria is a quiet one, confirmed three UN peacekeepers who were touring archeological ruins at Bet Shean the following day, on their day off.

"It's calm, but if nobody [like us] went there, everybody would do what they want," said one of them. He added that he sees recent cross-border trade – with Syrians buying apples from Druze villagers – as a small but significant sign of hope.

Three kilometres from the Syrian border, Kibbutz El-Rom is home to some 400 people. The kibbutz grosses $4 to $5 million (US) a year through its studio that makes Hebrew subtitles for American films, as well as the apples, grapes, cherries and blueberries it produces. Visitors – many of whom come to see the studio's 23-minute film on the Yom Kippur War – enter the property by driving through an electronic gate.

Mike Ben-Har, a 53-year-old kibbutz member originally from Connecticut, says the Golan is crucial from an ecological standpoint.

Will Israel give it back? "I sure as hell hope not," he said.

The silver-haired father of two, dressed in khaki shirtsleeves and an outdoorsman's vest, first visited Israel in 1974 and returned under the auspices of the kibbutz movement. "I found this place had not only captured my imagination; it captured my heart as well."

Fellow kibbutznik Dudi Murad, the kibbutz's tourism manager, says only the United States will decide the Golan's fate.

On a visit to the Golan Archeological Museum in Katzrin, which showcases local archeological artifacts from the time of the Mishnah and the Talmud, tour guide Anat Meiri, a former Bible studies teacher, made an impassioned plea for understanding that "we're not just talking about water, politics, security. We're talking about Jewish history here."

The Golan, which controls about one-third of Israel's drinking water, has some three million visitors a year, according to Eshed. About 70 to 80 per cent of them are Israeli, he said. "Tourism is developing very rapidly."

Even during this summer's war, people from the Galilee, farther south, came to the Golan, where there is "more open area," he said.

But local authorities are also looking for business investment in areas like high-tech, Eshed added. "The first software house will open in a few months in Katzrin," he said.

Shuki Shai, a businessman based in London, England, who spends about 100 days a year in Israel, is co-owner of the seven-year-old, upscale Chateau Golan Winery in the southern part of the Golan Heights. He is sanguine about investing millions in a place with an uncertain future.

If the Golan is returned to Syria, he will not get any compensation from the government, he said. "We do our thing. Sometimes we win. Sometimes we lose, but this is our life. That's my personal opinion… There is a chance they'll ask us to go. A good chance. If I have to leave, I'll never touch wine again [as a business]."

A practical businessman, Shai is also a nefesh romanti – a romantic soul, said his wife Shosh.

Although he is critical of former Israeli prime ministers who were prepared to give up the Golan, Shai agrees that ultimately its fate hinges on the United States. "When Israelis and Arabs sit down together [alone], they can't come to an agreement," he said.

Politics and anti-Israel sentiment in Europe have not affected the winery's sales to fine restaurants there, Shai said. "If they like the wine, they buy the wine." He believes he was the first to invest private money in the Golan, but added that others have followed.

Eshed said it is important to attract people to the area to "make the country stop talking about giving back the Golan." He admits to a certain ambivalence, however, because he believes the lack of development is part of the Golan's appeal.

A 51-year-old son of Holocaust survivors, Eshed was born in Poland and raised in Upper Nazareth after his parents made aliyah in 1958.

He and his wife, Orna – the former biologist of the Gamla Nature Reserve, who died last year of breast cancer – moved to the Golan 32 years ago "because we thought here is where true Zionists should be."

At first, he said, his parents did not approve. "It looked very dangerous. We were the first citizens that came, but after, they admitted we made the best decision."

Like most of the early settlers, Eshed become a farmer. Later, some 20 years ago, he embarked on business management studies, and still owns a chicken farm in Elyad.

Aside from its strategic significance, the Golan is home to "the most beautiful place in the world," Eshed enthused at a lookout point at the Gamla Nature Reserve.

Speaking in front of a craggy memorial to terror victims and fallen soldiers who lived in the Golan, Eshed pointed toward the deep canyon in front of him, and the hillside village of ancient Gamla, the lesser-known counterpart of Masada.

Three years before Masada fell, in the year 70 CE, the Jews of Gamla revolted against the Romans and committed mass suicide rather than convert, as they would at Masada three years later.

The nature reserve – where tourists may spot furry animals like hyraxes and a variety of birds including partridges, vultures, eagles, and hawks – is a respite, and part of it is wheelchair accessible.

"Stand here for a moment, and listen to the music," Meiri instructed, referring to the sound of the water from the Gamla Stream far below the vulture lookout.

The lookout, which will soon be equipped with a new digital audio-visual system to better see nesting birds both on site and via the Internet, will be named next month in memory of Eshed's wife.

Frances Kraft was in Israel recently as a guest of Israel's Ministry of Tourism.

Sometimes supplements are the smart solution

Q. I have been hearing a lot of buzz about vitamin D, related to both its disadvantages and its benefits. What does vitamin D do and where is it found?

A. You are right that there is a lot of interest in vitamin D now, and rightly so. Here are the facts: vitamin D is interesting because it isn't like most vitamins. It is actually more of a hormone found in all the cells in our bodies. Vitamin D helps with many important jobs at the cellular level. For example, it helps our body absorb calcium, regulate insulin, keep the immune system strong and build bones and muscles. One of the reasons that you are hearing so much about vitamin D now is that many researchers think we are getting far too little of this important vitamin.

So where is vitamin D found? Well, our skin can actually make it from the sun's ultraviolet rays, but for us, living in Canada, particularly in the winter when we have limited sun exposure, and even in the summer when we are often covered with sunscreen, we may not be getting our required amount. In fact, reports show that in Canada, the UV light is too weak to make vitamin D from late fall through early spring. So as we enter these months, you may want to consider where else you can get your daily serving of vitamin D?

Some fish, for example salmon, contains vitamin D in substantial doses, and milk has some, but only about 10 per cent of the daily requirement per one-cup serving. So how can you get your full amount? Your best bet for this vitamin is a daily supplement of 1,000 international units (IU) per day for adults.

The research on this vitamin is compelling. It is even showing in animal studies that this dose of vitamin D can dramatically reduce tumour growth and therefore the progression of cancers. It is clearly something that we want to include in our diet.

Q. I do not like dairy products very much, and since I keep kosher and like to serve meat meals, I find it hard to get the recommended amount of dairy products each day. Is a calcium supplement okay for me to use instead, and how much should an adult take?

A. It is certainly okay. I recommend calcium supplements to many of my patients of all ages if they aren't consuming enough dairy products.

Calcium supplements come in many forms now – from 1-gram tablets to 200- milligram flavourful chews in a multitude of flavours. Your best bet is a calcium supplement that has calcium and magnesium in a 2:1 ratio. This is best for absorption. You will also likely note that most calcium supplements contain vitamin D too, so take this into consideration if you are taking a separate vitamin D supplement. Aim for about 1,200 mg per day of calcium. It's okay if you eat some dairy on top of that.

Archeologist pens thriller about Holy Temple menorah

Crusader Gold* by David Gibbins, Headline Press of Britain (available under that imprint in Canada).

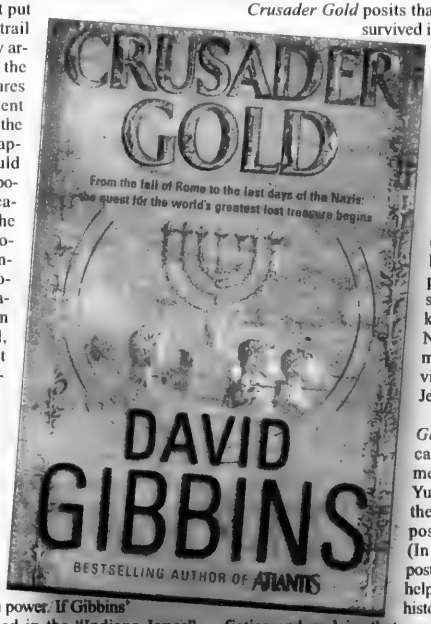
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The massive golden menorah from the Holy Temple of Jerusalem is the coveted object that fuels the modern-day action-adventure in Saskatchewan-born author David Gibbins' second novel Crusader Gold.

David Gibbins

Gibbins, who appeared at the International Festival of Authors in Toronto in late October, has penned a fact-based historical mystery thriller on the premise that the menorah outlived centuries of Roman captivity, was looted by a succession of historical players, and could have survived intact right down to the present day.

The book's protagonist is Jack Howard, an underwater archeologist who uncovers a set of clues that put him hot on the trail of the legendary artifact, one of the great lost treasures of the ancient world. Because the menorah's reappearance would have enormous political ramifications around the globe, a malevolent group connected to neo-Nazis is simultaneously on Howard's trail, hoping to keep it from resurfacing.



Jack Howard's fictional quest stretches over quite a historical sweep, taking him from the fall of the Roman Empire to the last days of Nazi power. If Gibbins' hero is fashioned in the "Indiana Jones" mould, he's also fashioned after the author himself.

Like his protagonist, Gibbins is an underwater archeologist with considerable field experience. Having earned a PhD at Cambridge in Roman maritime trade, he worked until recently as a university instructor in Roman history. His knowledge and familiarity with the subject give his writing a credible, almost documentary edge that modern readers seem to crave.

His previous book, Atlantis, has sold about half a million copies in various translations and been listed on the New York Times best-seller list for many months.

As recorded by the Jewish historian Josephus, the Temple menorah was looted by the Romans in 70 CE and brought to Rome. A frieze on Rome's famous Arch of Titus shows the prized object being carried into the city in a triumphal procession. Emperor Vespasian thereafter locked it away in the Temple of Peace, and it subsequently disappeared from the stage of history.

Outside of the realm of fiction, no further evidence has surfaced as to the menorah's fate, but historians have conjectured it was melted down and its gold used to fund the building of the Coliseum. "There was a sudden influx of money into Rome at that time," Gibbins said.

But what if the menorah was not melted down? According to Gibbins, snippets of historical evidence suggest it may have been looted by the Vandals in the fifth century and taken to Carthage, then looted by the Byzantines and carried to Constantinople. "What happens to it after that becomes a very dark mystery," he said. "That's where my story really springs from. It's at that point that my imagination really takes over."

Crusader Gold posits that the menorah survived in Constantinople until the medieval period and was plundered by the Viking warrior Harald Hardrada. An actual historical figure, Harald's exploits as a Crusader are well-known; a future Norse king, he may even have visited Jerusalem.

In Crusader Gold, Harald carries the menorah to the Yucatan, where the Mayans gain possession of it. (In an author's postscript, Gibbins helpfully separates historical fact from fiction and explains that no evidence exists for any Viking presence in North America outside of L'Anse aux Meadows, Nfld., and vicinity.)

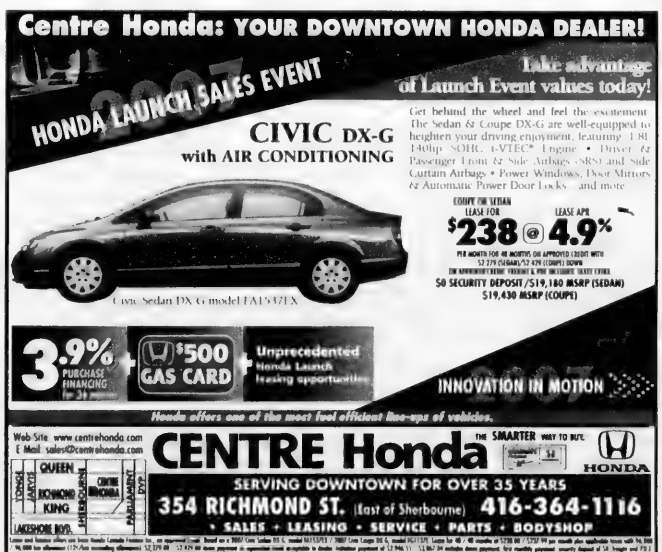
Gibbins said he was loath to weave a tale about the modern resurgence of the menorah in modern times within the context of the Jewish-Muslim struggle, so turned to more exotic story-lines. "There's a challenge between keeping the factual edge and making the book work as fiction," he said. It is perhaps his free use of arcane and incredible historical facts that has drawn so many readers around the world. (Atlantis was translated into dozens of languages.)

Another factor in the success of his books must certainly be his taut prose, which delivers both a depth of historical knowledge as well as the stamp of authenticity deriving from actual experience. "I've dived on an awful lot of fantastic wrecks," he said, then he described two that "really stand out."

One was a Roman shipwreck off Sicily, in which he found a Roman surgical scalpel – "the only time an ancient surgeon's kit has been found on a wreck." The other involved the excavation of a classical Greek wreck off Turkey, during which he blew sand from a gully to reveal row upon row of ancient drinking cups. "A sight like that gives you a feeling of immediacy, a feeling that you're very close to the people of antiquity."

Given his success as a novelist, Gibbins said his career as a novelist has trumped his archeological career, at least temporarily. All of the duties attendant upon a bestselling writer have made it impossible for him to accept any new archeological adventures at present. "I've got a contract for two new books, so I've had to backtrack a bit on the field work," lamented the former university lecturer, who divides his time between England and Canada.

During his interview with The CJN, he proudly offered a snippet of personal history: his great-great-grandmother, Rebecca Brandon, was a Portuguese Sephardi Jew who lived in London about 1830. And ever since visiting Israel as an archeology student, he has felt a special affinity for the Jewish state. "I continue to be enthusiastic about Israel. I think that the Israeli state is one of the most extraordinary stories of our time, and I hope the problems that plague it can be worked out."



Book gives 'women in the Bible a voice'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Marlee Pinsker, an educator and author, likens publishing a book to giving birth.

"It's that same feeling of excitement I remember when my three children were born and I felt this moment of unlimited potential. That what I feel with this book," she says.

"It's going to go out into this world and hopefully it will bring people closer to Torah."

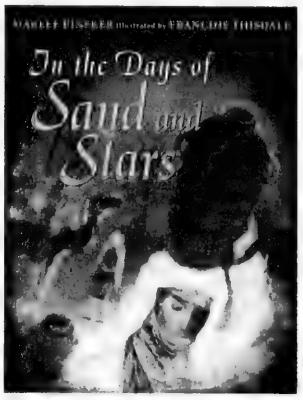
Pinsker's excitement is palpable over the phone as she talks about her first book, In the Days of Sand and Stars (Tundra Books), midrashic tales about women in the Bible.

Pinsker will be launching the book with a reading at the Darchei Noam Jewish Book Fair on Nov. 26. The reading will be held at Darchei Noam (the B'nai Brith building) 15 Hove St. from noon to 2 p.m.

Pinsker says one of her goals in writing her book was to give "women in the Bible a voice. Not very many women are quoted in the Bible."

She finds the book's illustrations by Francois Thisdale very moving, "He understood that book to the core. When I saw his picture of Rachel holding Joseph, I just burst into tears.

"He went to the heart of Rachel. He knew what that woman was about. The most important thing about her was that she wanted a child so badly and he captured that love."



Pinsker says the study of midrash is an exploration of biblical text to find new insights.

"We weave stories into the areas in which the text is silent, giving voices to the people we want to understand."

She stresses that Days of Sand and Stars is strongly rooted in the biblical text. "It's an imaginative retelling of the stories using the focus of the times that we live in – a contemporary look at ancient stories.

"With midrashic tales, we're being respectful of the stories we're given and adding without contradicting anything we've been told."

The book delves into the thoughts of seven women: Eve, Naamah, (Noah's wife), Sarah, Rebecca, Leah, Rachel and Yocheved (the mother of Moses).

In the chapter Leah and Rachel, Pinsker explores Leah's thoughts on her wedding day, when Jacob is duped into marrying her instead of her sister. Pinsker writes: "Under the heavy woolen veil she [Leah] felt she was alone for the first time in her adult life… Leah thought of the fights that were ahead of her when Jacob realized he was cheated out of his chosen bride."

According to Pinsker, this event is the "defining moment" in Leah's life. "She has to come to terms with the fact that she has married someone who doesn't love her and she has to make her life meaningful despite that."

In an earlier chapter, Pinsker describes Rebecca's thoughts as she meets Isaac for the first time: "Rebecca was suddenly frightened. Will he be cruel?…

"Slowly she turned to Isaac. He was gazing steadily at her, taking her in. He did not say a word to her but put out his hand. She took his hand. It was warm and firm and welcoming.

"A gentle husband, yes, and a quiet one perhaps, Rebecca smiled…"

Pinsker has been teaching senior kindergarten at the Toronto Heschel School since 1996 and has guided children and adults in the study of Torah.

AGO showcases photographer Alfred Eisenstaedt

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Alfred Eisenstaedt (1898-1995), a belt and buckle salesman before his successful foray into professional photography, was one of the pioneers of photojournalism.

One of his most famous photographs, The Kiss, was taken in Times Square, in Manhattan, on Aug. 15, 1945, the day Japan surrendered and World War II officially ended. It shows an exuberant American sailor ardently kissing a nurse, his arms draped around her waist.

Simple yet powerful in composition, it was published in innumerable newspapers and magazines and became one of the iconic images of the war.

St. Moritz, Grand Hotel

Regrettably, that striking photograph is not included in a new exhibition on Eisenstaedt at the Art Galley of Ontario, which opened last week and runs until Feb. 4.

In fact, it can only be found in the archives of Time-Life, which has the largest Eisenstaedt collection of photographs in the world.

It's easy to understand why Time-Life is in possession of that photograph. Eisenstaedt, a German Jew who immigrated to the United States in 1935, began working for one of its magazines, Life, in its inaugural edition in 1936.

For the next 15 years, he produced a series of photo essays for Life, one of the most most widely read magazines in the United States. In 1951, he was hired as a staff photographer, and in this capacity, he photographed personalities ranging from Ernest Hemingway and Marilyn Monroe to John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon.

But as the AGO exhibition demonstrates, Eisenstaedt was not just celebrity crazy. Indeed, as the 72 vintage photographs from the 1930s in this show prove, he was as much interested in everyday people as he was in celebrities.

The photographs, drawn from the Klinsky Press Agency in Amsterdam, were donated anonymously to the AGO in 2002 and are part of a collection of some 800 Eisenstaedt prints.

At a press preview, the AGO's curator of photography, Maia-Mari Sutnik, said that Eisenstaedt composed his pictorial narratives in "a very compelling way." Variously working with Zeiss, Ermanox and Rolleiflex cameras, Eisenstaedt favoured the worlds of art, theatre, music when he still lived in Europe.

Even when he was documenting the rise of Nazism in Germany, he had a propensity to focus on the arts. His disquieting 1934 photograph, Examination of a German Dancer in the Third Reich, hints at the degree to which culture was politicized by the Nazis.

By contrast, Eisenstaedt's pre-Hitler portraits of ballerinas are serene. The Smallest Ballerina is of a girl in a ballet class, her left hand clasping a bar, her right hand drooped delicately. One of his finest photographs, Max Terpin Ballet School, Berlin, features a group of adult dancers huddling and posing theatrically. Music School in Summer is timeless. A girl sitting on a chair patiently teaches her younger brother how to play the piano.

The other photographs from Eisenstadt's European period are intriguing as well. They run the gamut from Baking for the Population: The Largest Bakery in Berlin to St. Moritz, Grand Hotel and Pictures from Italian Travels.

But for this reviewer, Eisenstaedt's photographs from America are his best. Western Union Telegraph Boys is stark, strong and kinetic. Los Angeles, East Side distills the essence of poverty in a Depression-stricken country. Dark Glasses: The Newest Rage reflects Manhattan's skyline in a single pair of sunglasses, while Beverly Hills High School, California: Co-ed of the School, showing a black student in a segregationist society, is a study in irony.

Eisenstaedt's sharp eye and sense of design are both evident in the photographs now on display at the AGO.

The director of the AGO, Matthew Teitelbaum, commented last week that photography is a medium that "joins the generations." If this is true, Eisenstaedt's photographs may well live on until time immemorial.

HOLY BLOSSOM'S STAGECRAFT PRESENTS THE CEMETERY CLUB

Holy Blossom Temple's Stagecraft Company presents The Cemetery Club by Ivan Menchell, a comedy that director Michael Ryval describes as "a wonderfully touching play that reflects on the loss of a spouse, and yet does so with humor and compassion." The cast features Anna Grosman, Karen Garmaise, Glenda Mindlin, Eric Kirsh and Judy Kent.

Set in New York, The Cemetery Club depicts three widows who meet monthly for tea before visiting their husbands' graves. Like sisters, they argue and fuss over one another, and question whether they are ready to start another relationship.

Ida and Lucille are ready but Doris is unable to let go, preferring to live in the past. One afternoon at the cemetery they meet Sam, a widower who is visiting his wife's grave. When a romance develops between Ida and Sam, Lucille and Doris are determined to quash it – with comic and surprising results.

Stagecraft Company was founded in 1994 with a mandate to produce plays with Jewish themes and content. Previous productions include None Is Too Many, Women's Minyan, Crossing Delancey, The Tenth Man, The Last Night of Ballyhoo, I'm Not Rappaport, Yentl and The Ride Down Mount Morgan.

Eisendrath Auditorium. Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. $15-$10. Thursday, Dec. 7. and Saturday, Dec. 9, 8 p.m. and Sunday, Dec. 10, 2:30 p.m. 416-789-3291, ext. 511

Names in the News: Celebrated Russian photographer Roman Vishniac's haunting photos of Jewish life in eastern Europe were featured in Children of a Vanished World, a 1999 book edited by his daughter, Mara Vishniac Kohn. The photographs are also featured in a staged musical dramatization created by Toronto-based director Judy Kopelow, in which they are projected onto a large screen to the accompaniment of Yiddish folk songs intertwined with stories.

Children of a Vanished World has been performed in Toronto and Prague in years past. It was staged recently in California and is being performed Nov. 16 at Manhattan's 92nd Street Y. The production features an ensemble of young Canadian and Israeli musicians: soprano Marta Ewa Matulewicz, tenor Joey Niceforo, violinist Arnaud Sussmann, cellist Gal Nyska and clarinetist Tibi Cziger. The music was arranged by Hamilton conductor-composer Sabatino Vacca.

Kopelow, a former nurse at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and now a theatrical director, said she decided to stage the book as soon as she saw it. "These photographs and the memory of these children needed to have a life bigger than that book," she said. "In the performance, we try to imagine the potential of who these children might have become, and to celebrate and remember their lives."

Bar Mitzvahs to Die For: Some years ago a certain Toronto-area mayor threw a lavish bar mitzvah party for his son that is still remembered for its exorbitance and gaudiness. Now a new book – Gail Anthony Greenberg's Mitzvah Chic: How to Host a Meaningful, Fun, Drop-dead Gorgeous Bar or Bat Mitzvah (Fireside Books) – shows how it is done.

In compiling this guide, Greenberg drew on her knowledge of crafts, party planning and Torah. Instructions are given for writing speeches, drafting a d'var Torah, designing a memorable bash (even on a budget) and other essential tasks. According to one reviewer, the book is "the Martha Stewart guide to bar mitzvahs."

TERROR SUSPECT NAMED

CSIS believes Algerian explosives expert drove Toronto school bus

By Stewart Bell
Former Toronto school bus driver was the ringleader of an alleged Algerian terrorist cell that operated in the city until it was dismantled by Canadian counter-terrorism agencies, the National Post has learned

After being denied refugee status in Canada, Nourddine Zendaoui drove a school bus for a company called Student Express in Toronto
(Student Express was bought and now operated by Stock)

...just one of many such instances of terrorists driving school buses!

WHY USE SHOMER TRANSPORTATION?!

- Shomer drivers all have criminal record checks by the O.P.P.
- Shomer employs a previous Israeli Military Police Officer full time who understands what terror threats to prepare for.
- Shomer has now served the Jewish Community for nearly 25 years!!
- It is a "mitzvah - obligation" that a Jew should support another Jew (especially at comparable prices) Code of Jewish law

New Berlin Museum: Otto Weidt ran the Hackescher Markt, a working home for blind and deaf people in wartime Berlin that produced brooms and brushes. Because the enterprise was considered essential for the Nazi war effort, it was protected from some of the ravages of life in the Third Reich. Most of the employees were Jewish, and Weidt hid a family of four in a secret room and tried by every means to help as many Jews as possible to survive.

The discovery of Weidt's former workshop rooms in their original condition was an opportunity not to be missed. A museum was established, in which the exhibition "Blind Confidence – Hidden at the Hackescher Markt, 1941-1943" is currently on view. Rosenthaler Strasse 39, Berlin. www.blindes-vertrauen.de/introduction.html.

Is it good for the Jews? Yes and no, British author says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Is cholesterol good for the Jews? Is complaining good for the Jews? Is Google good for the Jews? Is guilt good for the Jews? Is happiness good for the Jews? Is ice cream good for the Jews?

Ask Jonny Geller. He knows the answers to these questions. His book, Yes, but is it good for the Jews?, a tongue-in-cheek account of current events and history, has just been published by Bloomsbury.

Geller, a 39-year-old British literary agent who was here last week to promote it, said that he wrote it in the Jewish tradition of self-parody.

"Jews are world famous for being good at poking fun at themselves. It is an obvious defence mechanism. We laugh at ourselves first before anyone else can."

It is an accidental book.

"I was pitching my clients' books to a New York editor one day," he recalled, "and I made a joke in passing about how funny it might be to view the whole world through the prism of whether it is good or not for the Jews."

Much to his surprise, the editor was intrigued by the idea and asked him to expand it into a full-blown book.

Describing its spirit as "warm and a bit informative," Geller said that it takes his late grandmother's view of the universe to an extreme.

"She used to come over every Shabbat for the Friday night meal, and after dinner, we'd congregate around the television to watch the news. She'd be fast asleep, snoring, but when the softly spoken voice of the newscaster would say, 'And now to Israel,' she'd miraculously wake up, bolt upright. Then, when the newscaster would say, 'And now to domestic news,' she'd go back to sleep like clockwork. It is this instinct I am celebrating and slightly parodying."

As he worked on the manuscript, he quickly realized that everything can be related to Jews. "I actually found it quite fascinating and somewhat shocking at times."

Geller said that his humour is miles removed from fellow Brit Sacha Baron Cohen's Borat-style putdowns.

But he added that, while some readers may find it upsetting, he never intended to offend anyone.

Nor does he deal in stereotypes or rehash classic Jewish jokes. "I tried hard to stay clear of them."

Asked what he had in mind, he recited the following joke: "A mugger approaches old Mr. Fegelstein. 'Your money or your life,' he says. Silence. 'Your money or your life,' he says again. 'I'm thinking, I'm thinking!'"

"No, there's nothing like that in my book," said Geller, whose favourite comedians and humourists have been Philip Roth, Sid Caesar, Woody Allen, Mel Brooks, Larry David and Jon Stewart.

Geller's book, his first, has already been published in Britain. "I wrote it specifically for the American market. But a non-Jewish agent I work with read the American manuscript and thought we should have a go. In the end, three publishers wanted to do it."

He has been thrilled by its reception back home.

"The Guardian newspaper, which is quite crititical of Israel, ran extracts on its front page. I was totally gobsmacked. Our own Jewish newspaper, the Jewish Chronicle, published excerpts over three weeks."

Though one might not think so judging by the tone of his book, Geller is actually quite a serious fellow.

"No, I'm not a jokester by day. I have to represent grown up writers and thinkers with my day job, so this is a bit of a strange departure. I trained as an actor after leaving university, so perhaps that part of me is trying to get out. I was born in North London, I grew up in the Habonim Zionist movement, and my father was an accountant. Not much funny about that."

Geller, who represents about 40 clients, mainly young and upcoming writers but also Sacha Baron Cohen, figures that this will be his last book.

As he put it: "I have quite a demanding day job and three kids under the age of nine."

QB sees season unravel in last minutes of playoff game

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In sports, there are come-from-behind, overcome-the-odds, win-in-the-last-minute victories, and there are lose-the-momentum, blow-the-lead, lose-a-game-you-should-have-won losses.

They usually occur in the same game – it just depends what side of the ball you're on.

Eric Grayson knows what it's like to be on the wrong side of the ball. Earlier this month, his Northern Red Knights suffered a last-minute heartbreaking defeat at the hands of arch-rival East York Goliaths, losing 21-20 in a TDSA South Region Tier 1 playoff game. On home field, no less.

Grayson, starting quarterback for the Red Knights, watched helplessly on the sidelines as East York turned a late fumble recovery at Northern's 45-yard line into the winning score.

Leading 20-15 with only 90 seconds left on the clock, Northern was in possession of the ball and needed only to run out the clock to secure the win.

Grayson, 17, called a running play and his fullback bulled ahead for eight yards. But at the tail end of the run, the Goliaths stripped the ball and recovered the fumble. Two plays later, facing third down and six, East York's quarterback fooled everyone, most notably Northern's defensive backs, and threw a long pass.

The call came out of the blue, Grayson explained, as East York had thrown only two passes in the entire game and one of them was intercepted, nearly for a touchdown.

This pass, however, caught the Red Knights napping and the resulting TD proved to be the margin of victory.

"It was devastating," Grayson said of the late score. "It was quite depressing."

The loss ruined what had been, to then, a remarkably successful season, both for the Red Knights and for Grayson personally. Northern had racked up a perfect 4-0 record, including a 33-6 regular season win over East York in which they "killed them," Grayson said.

Northern dominated the division, which included the Goliaths, the Central Tech Blues, the Leaside Lancers and the Lawrence Park Panthers. The Red Knights scored 119 points overall and allowed only 21.

The six-foot, 170-pound Grayson had a very good year, throwing for 11 TDs, adding a rushing major and tossing only one interception. Although he doesn't have the finals stats, he estimates he completed about 60 per cent of his throws.

A second Jewish player, Zach Sadowski, played cornerback and last year, a third Jewish player, Ely Matlow, was a mainstay of the defence as an inside linebacker. Matlow went on to play college football for the Mount Allison University Mounties.

Primarily a pocket passer, Grayson engineered the successful Northern season, but he felt the team was losing momentum as the year wore on.

"For some reason, the offence began to sputter going into the playoffs," he said. Blocking assignments began to break down and the attitude on the team deteriorated. The Red Knights went from "destroying opponents" to barely getting by them, he said.

Nevertheless, the playoff win was there for the taking. Northern's luck, however, turned bad right from the get-go.

On the first defensive series of the game, the team lost its middle linebacker to a knee injury. Northern sucked it up and played well, jumping to a 12-8 lead. It could have been 21-8 at the half, but the Red Knights were stymied on a third-and-inches gamble late in the second quarter on East York's two-yard line. Ouch.

By the middle of the third quarter, Northern had added to its lead, scoring an unconverted touchdown and going ahead 20-8. The missed convert – one of two that day – would turn out to be crucial, as two points were left on the field in a one-point loss. Ouch and double ouch.

Northern assumed the 20-8 lead after an 80-yard interception return that brought the ball to Goliath's one-yard line. Northern turned the turnover into a major score.

Earlier, Grayson contributed to the offence with a 70-yard TD pass on a deep fade pattern down the sidelines.

Northern's lead held up until very early in the fourth quarter, when East York narrowed the score to 20-15.

That set up the last-second heroics that left the Red Knights' fans in a state of shock. Adding insult to injury was the fact that East York eliminated the Red Knights in the playoffs last year, that time scoring a last-second field goal.

Grayson, who was the backup QB last year, won't have to contend with the Goliaths next season. A Grade 12 student, he expects to graduate and move on to university football. His dream team would be the University of Western Ontario Mustangs. He's talked to one of their recruiters, but that's as far as it's gone.

If he is accepted at Western, he'd like to eventually study medicine and become a surgeon. His fantasy job is to be a surgeon for a professional sports team.

In the meantime, Grayson expects to play football this summer with the Metro Toronto Wildcats. He'll also try out for Northern's track and field team in the long jump and he'll probably play outfield on the school's baseball team.

Grayson started playing quarterback at age 11 when he discovered he could really throw the ball. His first team was the North York Grizzlies in the Central Ontario Minor Football League, and by age 14 he was so good that he made the Team Ontario under-17 all-star squad. He was backup quarterback on that team, which travelled to Montreal and beat Quebec in an all-star game.

Inside Back

Who's the real fanatic?

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

In 1959, long before Western democracies began to consider strategies to confront radical Islam, Philip Roth explored the issue of banning religious attire in the public domain in his short story Eli, the Fanatic. A lawyer and assimilated Jew, Eli lives in Woodenton, long an enclave of well-to-do Protestants, but since the end of World War II home to a progressive community sprinkled with both gentiles and Jews.

Woodenton's leaders burden Eli with the task of confronting Leo Tzuref, headmaster of a European chassidic yeshiva that had recently moved into an old mansion in town. A yeshiva full of budding religious fanatics doesn't fit the peacefully secular life enjoyed by the citizens of Woodenton, so the townspeople enlist Eli to explore ways that the community can evict the new yeshiva.

While the mere existence of a fanatic religious institution in their midst angers the people of Woodenton, it's the presence of the yeshiva's single public figure that mobilizes them to get rid of the institution. That character, an unnamed rabbi clad in a ratty black hat and a well-worn black suit, shuffles into the town's main thoroughfare every few days to buy supplies for the yeshiva, each time delivering a hand-written shopping list to a store clerk without a word of introduction.

The sight of this shabby relic is enough to call the Woodenton community to action. Eli, armed with a briefcase full of legal technicalities, visits Tzuref at the school in an attempt to convince the headmaster to leave Woodenton. But when that attempt fails, Eli becomes more practical: after a second visit, he changes tactics, delivering a change of modern clothes – suit, shirt, hat, underwear – for the rabbi to wear when he next visits the town's shops. The rabbi complies, arriving in town the next day wearing his new duds. His old, tattered clothes are left in a box on Eli's front porch.

As Eli, the Fanatic concludes, the rabbi strolls around town in his new clothes while Eli, suffering from both a mental breakdown and a crisis of conscience, dons the Rabbi's old clothes and starts to wander the streets of Woodenton before being restrained by the townspeople.

Roth's message is clear: there's a fine line between fighting fanaticism and becoming the fanatic. The attempt to celebrate absolute uniformity – at least in the public domain – by outlawing visibly religious attire is actually a veiled (pardon the pun) kind of fanaticism. Eli, of course, experiences both sides of the debate – he starts off as the talking head for the secular fanatics, but is transformed, merely by switching outfits, into the religious fanatic.

In the fight against militant Islam, one of the new theories is this: if you force Muslims to look like everyone else, they'll start acting like everyone else. That thought was the driving force behind the French government's 2004 decision to ban religious symbols in schools. It's also the driving force behind a new bill proposed by the Dutch government that, if passed, would forbid Muslim women from donning facial veils in public, and it's the reason former British foreign secretary Jack Straw admitted in a recent editorial that he asks Muslim women to remove their veils during conversations with him.

The effort to end fanaticism – religious or otherwise – is always a worthy cause. But inherent in this endeavor is the danger of becoming precisely the fanatic you had hoped to eradicate. In the effort to create uniformity and civic equality, it's quite possible that what we reward is actually a form of secular fanaticism.

In 1959, Philip Roth posed the question that we should all be asking ourselves right now: who are the real fanatics?

GINGERED CARROT LATKES

6 cup coarsely grated peeled carrots
6 tblsp flour
1 1/2 tsp salt
3/4 tsp baking powder
1/2 tsp ground black pepper
7 tsp finely grated, peeled fresh ginger
3 large eggs, beaten

Canola oil (for frying)

Place carrots in large bowl; press with paper towels to absorb moisture. In another large bowl, whisk flour, salt, baking powder & pepper together. Mix in carrots, ginger, eggs.

Pour enough oil into heavy large skillet to cover bottom and heat over medium heat. Working in batches and adding more oil as needed, drop carrot mixture by 1/4 cupfuls into skillet; spread to 3 1/2". Fry until golden, about 5 min. per side. Transfer latkes to baking sheet. (Can be made ahead. Let stand at room temperature. Rewarm in 350°F oven until crisp, about 10 min.).

ROCKET ATTACK KILLS SDEROT WOMAN: Faina Slutzker (see inset) was mourned by her husband, family and friends at her funeral last week in Sderot, Israel. Slutzker was killed during a barrage of Qassam rockets last week that fell on the western Negev town. Nineteen rockets hit southern Israel on Nov. 15, killing Slutzker as well as seriously injuring two other civilians, one of them 17 years old, in Sderot. Damage was also caused to civilian infrastructure in the city of Ashkelon. [Israel Sun photos]

Needed: Jewish foster families

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

There are close to 200,000 Jews in Toronto, yet it's possible that Jewish children who need foster families will be placed in non-Jewish homes.

This cannot happen!

Consider the following: at any given time, Jewish Family and Child Service of Greater Toronto (JF&CS) has about 100 Jewish children in Toronto and York Region who need foster care for various reasons, including physical abuse, drug and alcohol addiction, an inability of parents to care for a child, etc.

JF&CS does a magnificent job of working with client families, foster parents and the Ministry of Community and Social Services to ensure that these children are cared for, and that they usually end up back in the homes of their biological parents.

Who are these children? Stereotypically, we might think that they come from low-income immigrant families, but that's not always the case. Children in foster care cross all social barriers, be they economic, religious or cultural.

Recently, JF&CS placed an ad in this paper seeking a foster home for a 14-year-old girl. The ad described her as "artistic and semi-independent, someone who would benefit from a home with teen siblings."

JF&CS was also seeking a home for three siblings ranging in age from eight to 14.

As with the 14-year-old girl, the ad said JF&CS' goal is to place these children in a Jewish home, but if that's not possible, they'll be placed with a family outside the community.

This is not right, my friends. This is not good.

The Jewish community prides itself on taking care of "our own," and we're mandated to do so by Jewish law. We're also perceived by others as being a role model for ensuring that Jews in need are always looked after.

The thought of placing a Jewish child in a foster home outside of the Jewish community is sad – not because the child wouldn't be well taken care of, but because it's anathema to our very essence as Jews – and it requires a powerful reaction from everyone reading this column.

It's very unfortunate that these children must be taken away from their biological families, and it's even more tragic that they will potentially be taken away from their culture and religion as well.

Consider becoming a foster parent. It's not easy, but it can be most enriching. Extensive training is provided, and the foster family works as part of a JF&CS team.

I used to attend a shul where some of the members were foster parents. I recall how infatuated they were both with the children themselves and with the opportunity to fulfil the mitzvah of helping a fellow Jew. I was told by one foster mother that her biological children benefited from having a pair of siblings, as well as another little girl, in their home at various times, knowing they were doing something very important for the community as well as developing a wonderful and responsible relationship with the foster kids. She added: "There were more people in the house, which made it more lively."

There are both long-term and short-term options for foster parenting, and JF&CS compensates foster families financially for their material needs through grants from the Ministry of Community and Social Services and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. JF&CS also accepts same-sex foster parents and single-parent foster families.

If you don't have the resources or ability to foster a Jewish child, consider becoming a big sister or big brother. The same need exists. We simply don't have enough community members interested in this rich volunteer opportunity. You commit to being a companion to one child, and to act as a role model to that child in the way your actual big brother or sister did for you.

The need is enormous!

Please explore these possibilities by contacting Selma Elzas, JF&CS' foster care co-ordinator, at 416-638-7800, ext 298.

Olmert offers comprehensive peace

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert presented a far-reaching vision of peace last week, reaffirming that Israel would be willing to withdraw from a great deal of territory in return for a true peace.

"I am extending my hand in peace to our Palestinian neighbours in the hope that it will not be returned empty," Olmert said in a major policy address at the grave of David Ben-Gurion in Sde Boker, during a ceremony commemorating the death of Israel's first prime minister.

"We, the State of Israel, will agree to withdraw from a large amount of territory and from the settlements that we established there – something that is very difficult for us, [equivalent to] a parting of the Red Sea. But we will do that in exchange for real peace," he said, directly addressing the Palestinians.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

"You must end the violence and terrorism and the desire to harm Israeli citizens in the south, north and centre, recognize our right to live in peace alongside you, and give up your demand for the right of refugee return,'" he said.

Olmert told the Palestinians that "the terror, the violence, the acts of murder and unending attacks on Israeli citizens are liable to lead to us a new painful wave of horrible violence."

He called on them to reject the "uncompromising extremism of your terrorist organizations" and choose a new path.

"We started on a path that I hope will bring us to the goal that we all want to achieve: peace, quiet and mutual trust," Olmert said, referring to last Saturday night's declaration of a ceasefire in Gaza.

The prime minister said if a new Palestinian Authority government accepts the conditions for legitimacy laid out by the Quartet (the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations), implements the "road map" peace plan and releases Cpl. Gilad Shalit, he will suggest a meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to conduct a "true, open and serious" dialogue.

Long-lost Jews return home

A group of 51 B'nai Menashe immigrants from India, who claim descent from one of the biblical lost tribes, arrived in Israel last week. Another 167 are expected soon. About 1,000 B'nai Menashe currently live in Israel. The Jewish Agency for Israel, assisted by a donation from the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, is facilitating the group's absorption in Israel.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Tribunal Hears Case

TORONTO — A white pride activist appeared before a human rights tribunal in Toronto last week for allegedly violating Canada's Human Rights Act with hateful postings on her group's website about Jews, blacks and Arabs, the London Free Press reported. Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman brought the charges against Michelle Guille, a leader of the Southwestern Ontario-based Canadian Heritage Alliance. He says the site urges attacks on blacks, Jews and Arabs, and that postings say the Shoah didn't occur and that Jews kidnap Russian children to sexually torture them in pornographic films.

WORLD

Eruv Gets Go-ahead

LOS ANGELES — A California shul won permission to erect an eruv after four years of negotiations. The Shul on the Beach will install the Shabbat barrier along the Pacific shoreline and inland area. The Orthodox congregation in Venice, bordering Los Angeles, won approval from the California Coastal Commission to create an unbroken symbolic border to allow observant families to carry objects outside on Shabbat. The eruv consists of fishing line strung between utility poles. The Venice case was sensitive because the line would run near the nesting area of a protected bird. But after the shul agreed to put metallic streamers on the line near the nesting area to warn off the birds, it got the go-ahead.

El Al Bomb Plot

BERLIN — Germany is probing an alleged plot to blow up an El Al plane. German prosecutors last week said the plot was uncovered when suspects tried to get an airport worker to put a bomb on a passenger plane. The suspects made contact with the person, but couldn't agree on a price to plant the explosive. Authorities arrested six suspects Nov. 17, releasing five the next day. The sixth was held on an unrelated matter. El Al had no comment on the report.

EC Nixes Boycotts

BRUSSELS — The European Commission said it doesn't back boycotts of Israeli academic institutions. The International Campaign for Academic Freedom and Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, two groups campaigning against boycotts, solicited the EC's position after 61 Irish academics wrote to the Irish Times in September calling for a moratorium on EU support of Israeli academic institutions until Israel ends its occupation of Palestinian areas. In a letter last week, the EC's External Relations Directorate-General said such boycotts "are contrary to the principles of academic freedom." The EC is the European Union's executive body.

Attacks Down

PARIS — Anti-Semitic attacks in France have dropped drastically due to state initiatives, France's foreign minister says. "We have obtained real results" since a crackdown began in 2002, Dominique de Villepin said in comments to a World Jewish Congress Nov. 12 that were released Nov. 20 by his ministry. "In 2005, anti-Semitic acts fell by 47 per cent compared with the previous year. The figures available today for 2006 confirm this downward trend." De Villepin added that 1,200 police officers are exclusively assigned to protect the Jewish community.

Muslim Backed Irving

LONDON — A British Muslim leader admitted he helped fund Holocaust denier David Irving. Asghar Bukhari, a founder of the Muslim Public Affairs Committee, pledged money to Irving's legal fund in 2000, the Observer newspaper reported. He also said in a letter at the time that he would urge Islamic groups to back Irving's efforts to "expose certain falsehoods perpetrated by the Jews." Bukhari confirmed the report, but said he was motivated by anti-Israel sentiments rather than anti-Semitism and that he opposed Holocaust denial.

German Urges Transparency On Looted Art

BERLIN — Germany's culture minister and museums called for greater transparency and more provenance research for the restitution of Nazi-looted art.

The statement came after Bernd Neumann met in Berlin with museum heads on Nov. 20. The meeting followed a contested restitution of Ernst Ludwig Kirchner's 1913 Berlin Street Scene.

Berlin's Bruecke Museum passed the painting to the heir of the Hess family, which had been persecuted by the Nazis. The heir auctioned the work Nov. 8 for $38 million (US).

The museum's patrons association argued that the Bruecke had given up the work of art too easily and questioned whether the original owner, Tekla Hess, had really sold under duress or received less than the painting was worth.

Germany signed an agreement in 1998 to identify and return works of art illegally taken during the Nazis' reign.

"Restitution must become more transparent, better co-ordinated and more irreproachable," Associated Press quoted Neumann as saying.

The minister is to meet with the Claims Conference later this year to discuss the issue.

Kramer Anti-Semite?

LOS ANGELES — A comedian under fire for hurling racial epithets at blacks once similarly attacked Jews, fans said. Two comedy fans told the website TMZ.com that Michael Richards, who played Kramer on Seinfeld, attacked a man speaking during his performance last April as a "f--- ing Jew" and said, "You people are the cause of Jesus dying." The fans wondered at the time if the slurs were part of the act, but came forward after Richards launched a racist attack on two black men who heckled him at a recent performance. Richards' publicist confirmed the April incident, but said it was part of his act, unlike the more recent attack.

Restitution Rejected

RIGA — Latvia's Parliament rejected a law on the restitution of Jewish property. The government proposed paying $58.7 million (US) to Latvia's Jewish community over 10 years for property taken by the Communist government after the Shoah. But parties that back the government, with 67 out of 100 legislators, abstained from the vote, saying the bill needs more discussion.

Ont. election date conflicts with Shemini Atzeret

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Next year's provincial election is slated for Thursday, Oct. 4, 2007. Unfortunately for Jewish voters, that day is also Shemini Atzeret.

The Election Act, passed in 2005, fixes voting dates and states that every four years, the first Thursday of October will be provincial election day.

If next year's date remains firm, observant Jews will be unable to exercise their democratic right to vote or work in the election.

Oct. 4, 2007, could also see Ontarians voting in a referendum on electoral reform, if the provincial government's Citizens' Assembly on Electoral Reform recommends a vote on change to the electoral system.

This potential double-vote date is of great concern to Canadian Jewish Congress.

Stephen Adler, director of public policy for CJC Ontario, said his organization began advocating months ago to alert chief election officer, John Hollins, Premier Dalton McGuinty and Marie Bountrogianni, the minister of democratic renewal, about the gravity of the matter.

"We wrote letters providing research showing that it was only the October 2007 date that was problematic and that the dates up to 2023 were clear [of] Jewish holy days," he said.

On Oct. 24, Elections Ontario posted a survey on its website and sent it out to community organizations, asking them to respond with election date concerns by Nov. 24.

CJC Ontario sent out reminders to about 200 Jewish community organizations, urging them to fill out and return the Elections Ontario questionnaire.

'It's not just a Jewish issue,' says CJC

Adler said other communities could be similarly disenfranchised. "It's not just a Jewish issue," he said.

Paula Chung, a spokesperson for Elections Ontario, said under the Election Act, the chief election officer can advise the lieutenant governor to move the election date if there is "sufficient cause," which may include "cultural or religious significance".

The alternate vote date would then have to fall within seven days of Oct. 4.

In 2007, the choices are further limited by the fact that Friday Oct. 5, is Simchat Torah, Saturday Oct. 6, is Shabbat, and Monday Oct. 8, is Thanksgiving.

Heather Bussey, communications manager at Elections Ontario, said any community with concerns about the election date can still contact her office, even though the Nov. 24 deadline has passed.

"We're hoping to have responses in by the end of the year [because] the chief election officer will be looking at them in January," she said.

Bussey added that her office consulted a range of religious and cultural organizations across the province about the date.

"We used various information sources to make sure we had the best cross-section possible," she said.

If the chief election officer does recommend moving the vote, it will then be up to Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman to change the polling date.

"The office of the chief elections officer does not make the decision, and we are not aware of what criteria will be used by the lieutenant governor in council," Bussey said.

Under the Election Act, any decision to move the date must be made by Aug. 1.

Calls to Bartleman were not returned.

Opinions of note

From the editor's desk

Two weeks ago in The CJN, the editorial pointed to the perfidy of former president Jimmy Carter in tagging Israel as an apartheid state through his newly released book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.

The term "apartheid" resonates throughout the world with unambiguous moral opprobrium. It has only one meaning. It evokes only one association. It requires only one response. Apartheid is an abusive, oppressive, repressive human evil that must be eliminated.

Carter knew this as well as anyone. It is reasonable therefore to assume that by so prominently using the term in reference to the conflict with the Palestinians – on the very cover of the book, no less – he intended the association to be made with Israel. He must have also known that he would be echoing the odious charge that has fulminated in the mouths of the most rabidly anti-Israel advocates for many decades.

His polemic is unpardonable.

This cannot be overstated. The harm that may result to Israel is very grave.

For this reason, I call readers attention to an article by Rabbi David Forman that appeared in the Jerusalem Post last week.

As an Israeli human rights activist, in fact, as the founder of Rabbis for Human Rights, he is uniquely qualified to comment on the Carter calumny. This is how he began the article.

"If one picture is worth a thousand words, then the cover of Jimmy Carter's new book, Palestine: Peace, Not Apartheid, will sear a damning image of Israel into the consciousness of anyone who walks into a bookstore," Rabbi Forman wrote.

"The book's cover shows a thoughtful and obviously troubled Jimmy Carter, who believes that he is the moral voice of all those who suffer human rights indignities, overlooking the security wall Israel has built, with thousands of Palestinians protesting in front of it.

"It is difficult not to draw the 'obvious' conclusion – the Israeli wall is equal to the Warsaw Ghetto wall. Carter equates the wall with the ethnic cleansing of Arabs.

"What a warped sense of history, past and present; what a blatant abuse of our sensibilities. I look at the cover… and ask myself, would it not have been far more appropriate had Carter, instead of superimposing his own humble presence over the wall, superimposed a replica of the hundreds of memorial plaques that dot Israeli bus stops, restaurants, supermarkets, malls and synagogues where Palestinian suicide bombers carried out their acts of murder?

"The security fence did not come about in a vacuum. Would any country in the world do differently if going out of the house meant that its citizens played Russian roulette with their lives?"

Rabbi Forman recoiled at Carter's obvious selectivity in singling out Israel for human rights abuses. He pointedly recalls a long list of abuses of the most horrible kind perpetrated within the Arab world that appear to have been ignored by the former president. He concluded the article thus:

"Despite Carter's perfunctory statements about Arab intransigence and terrorist tactics, for him the blame for the present conflict between Israelis and the Palestinians lies almost exclusively with Israel.

"The barrier is a necessary evil, which unfairly impinges on some of the elemental rights of the Palestinians. But that is a far cry from endorsing apartheid. Indeed, by using such a loaded term, enforced by that indelible image on his book's cover, Carter is purposefully providing a great measure of both respectability for and acceptability of the Muslim world's drive to wipe the Jewish state off the face of the globe."

Why would Carter lend his support this way to the enemies of Israel?

* * *

In a different vein, for the purpose of buoying emotions that have so long lain low, I bring readers' attention to the essay The War of Fog by David Hazony, which appeared in the recent Autumn issue of Azure, published by the Shalem Center in Jerusalem.

Written in mid-September, Hazony assesses the results of Israel's war with Hezbollah that ended one month earlier. He minces no words. He cites the bad and the good. But it is his very last observation that I wish to share.

The following is an excerpt.

"The war revealed something of inestimable value: a resilience among Israelis that neither its friends nor its enemies counted on…

"This must have come as a shock to Israel's enemies. It is a long-standing myth among Muslim radicals that western democracies possess an inherent weakness: that their love of commerce and bourgeois pleasure will inevitably render them incapable of standing up for their own way of life; that the determination and purity of the jihad will defeat the morally flaccid, potbellied bobos of Brussels and Brookline [N.H.]. Yet time after time, this belief is proven wrong. Even if democratic leaders sometimes show faintness of heart, democratic peoples are frequently willing to endure hardship and to fight ferociously to defend their freedom.

"The determination of the Israeli public to lay aside decades of ideological turmoil… and unite in defence of the Jewish state and its values against a deadly enemy was nothing short of breathtaking."

Democracies take heart! –MBD

CUPE locals reject resolution critical of Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The unanimity that marked passage of CUPE Ontario's Resolution 50 calling for a boycott of Israel is beginning to dissipate.

In recent weeks, sessional lecturers at the University of Toronto represented by CUPE local 3902 passed a motion rejecting Resolution 50 while CUPE local 79, representing 18,000 City of Toronto and community housing workers, announced it would not co-operate in an educational campaign to support the controversial resolution.

Both locals stated that Resolution 50 was unfair, unbalanced and had discredited CUPE's reputation.

Last May, delegates to CUPE Ontario convention in Ottawa voted overwhelmingly in favour of a resolution that supported an international boycott and divestment campaign targeting Israel and that called for development of an "education campaign about the apartheid nature of the Israeli state and the political and economic support of Canada for these practices."

At the time, CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan defended the apartheid reference, saying "it's clear to anybody with any degree of common sense that there are clear parallels with what is happening in Palestine to South Africa."

In a recent letter to Ryan, Ann Dembinski, president of CUPE 79 stated that her local would not participate in training in support of Resolution 50.

"The reason is that Resolution 50 fails the test of even-handedness and fairness and has discredited CUPE's reputation in Ontario. We are distressed to think that the educational tour will now add fuel to those fires."

CUPE 3902, which represents about 5,000 short-term instructors and lecturers at U of T, passed a resolution late last month saying it "will not endorse or implement Resolution 50 passed by CUPE Ontario division.'

The motion goes on to adopt part of a resolution passed by CUPE's national wing in 2003 that "actively work[s] towards an end to all acts of violence that take the lives of innocent people, whether they be Palestinian or Israeli."

It also resolves "that as a local, we will help to promote the interests of our fellow workers in the Middle East by consulting with and actively pursuing positive relations with the free and democratic labour union movement in the Middle East."

'Fails test of even-handedness'

Ari Brodsky, a mathematics lecturer and a member of local 3902, spearheaded the effort to reject the Ontario wing's "outrageous" resolution.

"As a local, we are seen as supporting Resolution 50 if we don't say anything against it," he said.

Encouraged by his rabbi in Ottawa, Brodsky took his concerns to the local's stewards' council, which includes representatives from faculty departments.

The council set up a three-person committee that included Brodsky. After consulting other local members, it proposed the resolution, which later received "pretty strong endorsement" from the council. The resolution then was passed at a general meeting of local members in a narrow vote, Brodsky said.

Brodsky argued that Resolution 50 "is unfair, unbalanced, one-sided and anti-Israel.

"It singled out Israel for criticism and the boycott is completely unreasonable," he said. "I think many ordinary members of the local, non-Jewish, see it as unfair and a divisive measure that CUPE Ontario took."

He noted that when Resolution 50 was adopted last May, its proponents touted it as passing without opposition. CUPE 3902's resolution "shows ordinary Canadian workers support a position that doesn't take sides in the Arab-Israeli conflict" and does not support a boycott.

Local 3902 will not take part in educational programs on the Middle East promoted by the union's provincial wing, he added.

On its website, CUPE Ontario cites support from within the Jewish community and from Israel for its position, including "The Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians, a newly formed national organization representing organizations, individual academics and activists from across Canada," Bruce Katz, "the Jewish co-president of Palestinian and Jewish Unity in Montreal" and "Israeli Seekers of Peace and Justice." The latter group sent a letter of support with more than 120 signatures.

Ryan could not be reached for comment by the CJN's deadline.

Prof sues Jewish groups, York U for $25M

A history professor at York University has launched a $25-million defamation lawsuit against a number of senior Jewish organizations as well as the school's fundraising arm.

David Noble alleges the 13 defendants wrongly suggested he was anti-Semitic when they responded to a flyer he distributed in November 2004. The flyer, titled "The York University Foundation: The Tail That Wags the Dog," alleged that the foundation was biased by the influence of pro-Israel lobbyists and that the bias affected the university administration's treatment of pro-Palestinian activists.

Noble, who is Jewish, alleges the defendants smeared him in a bid to silence him.

Among those named in the lawsuit are United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress (Ontario region), Joel Richler (Ontario regional chair of Congress), Hillel of Greater Toronto, Hillel at York University and the York University Foundation.

In October 2005, Noble took issue with the university's policy of cancelling classes during three High Holy Days. In April 2006, he filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission, alleging cancellation of the classes amounted to discrimination against non-Jewish students.

Jewish groups oppose closure on human rights bill

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups and human rights activists are upset with the provincial government for closing debate on a bill that will streamline the process of bringing cases under the Ontario Human Rights Code.

Canadian Jewish Congress said it was "disappointed" at the move to end debate, particularly after the province had welcomed discussion on Bill 107.

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights said "the government plan to pull the plug on Bill 107 committee hearings makes a sham of consultation process."

And Barbara Hall, chief commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, wrote to Premier Dalton McGuinty, saying the way the debate was handled has caused needless divisions in the community.

"When the amendments were announced in the spring, CJC Ontario region welcomed the government's actions to improve and expedite the human rights complaints process for the benefit of all complainants," said Joel Richler, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "The people of Ontario have a vested interest in strong, responsive and accessible human rights legislation and we are disappointed that debate is being ended before all stakeholders can be heard."

Len Rudner, Congress' director of community relations, said the Jewish organization had been scheduled to appear before the standing committee on justice policy on Dec. 7. Congress is concerned that the bill, which would see complainants hire their own lawyers and take their cases directly to a human rights tribunal, sidestepping the commission's gate-keeping role, would leave some without the means to access the process, he said.

The government proposals open a gap in accessibility and the proposed legislation does not provide the legal resources to complainants that would address that omission, he said.

Toni Silberman, immediate past chair of the League for Human Rights said, "the Ontario Liberal Party ran on a platform of democratic reform. What has transpired throughout the process surrounding Bill 107 is anything but democratic.

"This so-called community consultation process on Bill 107 has been fraught with difficulty since its inception. It is now appears that the government is poised to end debate even before it had any meaningful chance of getting off the ground. Fairness, justice and equality demands that the motion be withdrawn immediately in order to allow the committee hearings to continue uninterrupted."

In an open letter to McGuinty, Hall stated that "what should have been a broad, consensus-building exercise in the best traditions of promoting human rights was undertaken in a way which, instead, caused division within the communities concerned."

Ontario Public Service Employees Union president Leah Casselman called the closure of debate "an outrageous assault on the very people who need a strong, pro-active Human Rights Commission the most."

At Queen's Park, Progressive Conservative leader John Tory asked in Question Period, "why is the premier bringing the guillotine down on this debate?" while NDP leader Howard Hampton asked the Premier to justify this "betrayal of trust."

Bill 107 was introduced in April to address a system that had become bogged down. Complaints could take up to five years to be resolved.

Responding to critics, Attorney General Michael Bryant said there had been "ample" debate on the bill and very little that was new was being advanced at committee hearings.

Human rights or human shield?

Former Canadian Supreme Court justice and current High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour completed a five-day fact-finding tour last week in Israel and the Palestinian territories. She came to the region to investigate charges of human rights violations by Israel after the United Nations Human Rights Council and the General Assembly condemned a strike by the Israeli army at Beit Hanoun in Gaza in which 19 Palestinian civilians were accidentally killed.

At the conclusion of her visit, Arbour spoke to members of the press and expounded upon her findings and upon her theories of relative and absolute culpability for the deaths among Palestinians and Israelis that the conflict has caused.

"In one case you could have, for instance, a very objectionable intent – the intent to harm civilians, which is very bad – but effectively not a lot of harm is actually achieved," she said. "But how can you compare that with a case where you may not have an intent but you have recklessness [in which] civilian casualties are foreseeable?… According to criminal law, there is very little distinction between recklessness and intent," she said. "It is a small distinction as to whether you desire the result, or you foresee it as virtually certain and you do not care. In terms of culpability, there is not a lot of difference between recklessness and intent."

This statement of principle may be technically correct in relation to domestic criminal law. But it has less application in the international arena, where a democratic state is trying to defend itself against armies trying to destroy it. The high commissioner has stumbled on the slippery slide of pre-conceived notions.

The deaths of the 19 in Beit Hanoun was a terrible mistake for which Israel apologized and expressed profound regret. It is not true though, as Arbour implied, that Israel did not care. Indeed, to the delight of the planners and practitioners of terrorism, Israel always warns civilians prior to a strike whenever there is a risk to innocent life. In contrast, Hamas deliberately targets innocents; uses homes and workplaces as rocket launching sites; uses women and children as shields against Israeli retaliation; uses grandmothers, children and pregnant women as suicide bombers; and uses baby carriages, the bags of school children and ambulances to smuggle explosives. Yet, Arbour appears to hold the terrorist leaders to a lesser standard of care simply because they kill actual fewer numbers than they try to. In doing so, she effectively gave them – and their fellow thugs and other genocidalists – a form of legal cover.

Arbour is learned and sincere. But she is wrong. Ironically, the doctrine she invoked against Israel – foreseeability of harm – is the likely result of her intervention. In the name of protecting the human rights of innocents, she has merely provided another shield to those for whom human rights means less than yesterday's detritus.

U.S. president Ronald Reagan told U.S. Jewish leaders that he stood by a campaign pledge to support a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty with a "vaticanization" of holy sites there. Secretary of state Alexander Haig clarified that this wasn't a change in U.S. policy, which was that the city should stay undivided and its status determined by negotiation.

Open dialogue about Israel needed

In his column "The source of Ignatieff's myths" (CJN, Nov. 9), Gerald Steinberg does a disservice to all of us, and in particular to the State of Israel. The well-being and security of Israel is uppermost in the minds of Jewish communities worldwide and countless others.

There are cases when vicious propaganda is used. Any intelligent person should know the difference between fact and fiction. Failing to check sources thoroughly is counterproductive and harmful. That, I believe, is what Steinberg has done in his column, which condemns Human Rights Watch. If there can be open dialogue, questioning and critique in Israel, surely we in the Diaspora can engage in a thorough form of discourse.

The Israel Defence Forces admitted there were no rocket strikes from the building at Qana and that there was no Hezbollah presence during the attack. Even Israel does not claim that there were any fighters among the 28 civilians killed.

Human Rights Watch, since 2000, has produced more reports on Iran, Iraq, Egypt, Sudan and Turkey than on Israel. So much for Israel being its "main focus."

HRW publicly denounced the harmful statements made at the UN Durban conference on racism, and its comments were carried by newspapers around the world.

Experienced HRW workers range from former Pentagon officials to workers in several war zones around the world. It took HRW three months to report on Israeli use of cluster bombs, but HRW broke the story that fragmentation bombs were used by Hezbollah.

Israel has not disputed the fact that there was no Hezbollah presence in some two dozen cases resulting in death and injury during the Israeli-Hezbollah war.

HRW is one of the important sources of information. In order to be better informed, in order to assist Israel in a positive sense, in order to engage in meaningful dialogue, Steinberg could have checked his sources. If we are going to disagree on issues, then let those issues, from all angles, be discussed and written about with integrity.

UNHRC must speak against Hamas

While grateful that United Nations Human Rights Commissioner Louise Arbour was not injured by a terrorist rocket during her visit last week to the Israeli town of Sderot, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies urges that Arbour urge the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) to condemn daily terrorist targeting of Israeli civilians.

While it may have lasted only one day for her, deadly Qassam barrages have been a daily threat for more than five years to the citizens of Sderot and surrounding southern Israeli communities.

Two months ago, I participated in the Simon Wiesenthal Center's presentation to Arbour of Israeli and Lebanese witnesses to Hezbollah atrocities, and unlike the UNHRC itself, she unequivocally declared to us that Hezbollah was guilty of crimes against humanity for firing rockets laden with ballbearings at civilian hospitals and population centres.

Now, as she returns to Geneva, her message to the UNHRC must be that there are two populations, on both sides of the border, that are suffering and this is because of one cause: Palestinian terrorist extremists who target the children of Sderot and use Palestinian civilians as human shields to protect themselves.

Arbour must speak out against Hamas' continuing copying of Hezbollah's tactics. Her role as chief international human rights officer demands it, as do all who seek to live in democracies free of acts of terror.

No complaint made to ombudsperson

While I appreciate that reporter Jenna Rosman made reference to the Excalibur article about the anti-Semitic incident in my classroom, she erred in saying that I had said I would file a complaint with the university's ombudsperson regarding the incident ("Anti-Israeli activists rally at York, U of T," CJN, Nov. 23).

While I may have made that statement privately, the article itself made no reference to my having said anything of that nature, nor did Rosman contact me to find out if I had actually made that statement. In fact, I have no idea how she even came to this conclusion.

Borat's Jewish problem

By RON CHARACH

Much ink has been spilled over Sacha Baron Cohen's film Borat. It has been described by one CBC critic as "a film about how foreigners see Americans and how Americans see foreigners." Unfortunately, it also unwittingly re-enforces conventional anti-Semitic stereotypes.

By now most readers likely know that Borat Sagdiyev is a sex-obsessed, oddly lovable "Kazakh" character, a naïve foreigner travelling through America with his producer friend Azamat making a documentary about American life. Early on, he gets sidetracked by a Baywatch video featuring Pamela Anderson and becomes determined to find and profess his love to the glamorous blonde TV Star.

Sacha Baron Cohen, an observant Jew, portrays Borat in a way that anti-Semites will recognize, especially those among them who are more irony-challenged. Borat as Semite is by turns pushy, ingratiating and rude, oversexed, and in hot pursuit of a blonde white "shiksah goddess," Anderson.

The stereotype of the Jew-as-unethical-person (source of the slang term "to Jew" someone) is invoked by the questionable ethics of the film's production team, who may have duped the film's interviewees into saying, or agreeing with, racist or sexist sentiments, only to find themselves exposed, not in the Kazakh media, but in a top-grossing, gross-out American comedy.

Two of the film's subjects have initiated lawsuits, members of a fraternity who claim a breach of trust was involved in consent forms they signed while inebriated with alcohol supplied by the film's production team. The studio has denied any wrongdoing, but even the New York Times has weighed in, regretting that the film took unfair advantage of generous midwestern and southern hospitality.

But of more concern are claims by the villagers of Glod, Romania, who allege that their impoverished condition was exploited by Borat's film directors, who set up situations in which women and the physically handicapped were ridiculed, often in an obscene way. Such behaviour clearly runs against treasured Jewish values such as tzedakah (charity) and tikkun olam (striving to perfect the world).

Compare this to the highly ethical behaviour of an earlier Jewish comedic impresario, Allan Funt, innovator of the Candid Camera series. Funt was good at soothing the hurt pride of those who were taken in by his unlikely scenarios, and he wrote a very catchy theme song urging people to sit back and join others in having a chuckle about their universally shared naiveté. Needless to say, those were more innocent times.

The caricatured Jew-as-outsider and violator of convention is evident in more subtle ways. Borat substitutes his own national song for the American national anthem that he is entrusted to sing at a rodeo show, and he gratuitously insults a southern, genteel (and gentile) dinner party given to welcome him. In one of the least funny moments in the movie, Borat mishears a gentleman guest's claim to be "retired" as "retarded." He also turns out to be one "furriner" you'd better not trust to use your upstairs bathroom, and the excrement he hands to his hostess in a doggy bag represents one of the greatest breaches of continuity in the history of film comedy. Earlier, this same Borat had delighted in displaying photos of women taken in toilet booths, so why should he suddenly be a stranger to such modern conveniences?

Borat reporting on the "Running of the Jews"

Like Howard Stern on radio, Sacha Baron Cohen goes out of his way to invert decency by deciding to cavalierly identify his country of origin as Kazakhstan, instead of, say, Boratstan. Kazakhstan is not, in reality, a worst-offender when it comes to anti-Semitism, though movies like this could change that. Ironically, as a former Communist country, its treatment of women is more egalitarian than what one sees in most Arab Muslim countries. The country has also, in recent years, made co-operative overtures toward Israel.

Clearly, Borat champions many things that are anathema to Jews, such as sexual predation, contempt for the intellectually challenged, cruelty to animals and, of course, voraciously enthusiastic anti-Semitism – all, mind you, in the spirit of a good belly-laugh. It would be easier to see Baron Cohen as a consummate ironist who might, in real life, stand for the reverse of all the things that his character eagerly trumpets. However, the real Baron Cohen offers little guidance to his fans, and rarely comes out of character to offer his audience a bit of direction about his real views. This point was made by a Newsweek culture critic who also noted that Borat's shtick – becoming the kind of person he hates – is similar to techniques used by comics such as Sarah Silverman, whose persona is that of a racist and entitled "Jewish American Princess."

Borat in Canada

Why would an apparently observant Jew do such a disgraceful send-up of his people? Was not disgraced Congressman Mark Foley a self-hating gay who championed anti-gay stances? Talk-show host Larry King recently asked comedian Bill Maher, "Why would anyone who was gay take so many anti-gay stands?" Maher, son of a Jewish mother and a Catholic father, shot back, "Because, Larry, self-hatred is the greatest love of all."

It's up to the viewers of a movie like Borat to decide whether Sacha Baron Cohen is extremely funny or careening out-of-control and overstepping the boundaries of true comedy. Likely, both are true, and by the time all this is over, he may have more lawsuits than awards. Some critics have faulted this take-no-prisoners movie for avoiding anything that might overtly offend Muslim viewers. As if he doesn't already have enough tsuris.

Extremely funny or careening out-of-control?

Some will vote with their feet and make their exit early in the movie. The nude wrestling scene, for which Borat's co-star Ken Davidian deserves a Purple Heart rather than an Oscar, is a send-up of pornography – never has the 69 position been more inadvertent or less palatable. Even the teenagers in the audience squirmed at it, and screamed at a manic chase sequence that was the ultimate fat joke.

Those who see hilarity as the greatest of all virtues, or political correctness as the greatest of vices, will grant Baron Cohen the same license given to other envelope pushers such as Don Rickles, Howard Stern, Jackie Mason or, to use a non-Jewish example, Dave Chapelle. In an earlier, less liberal era, comics who crossed the line into violating their audiences, such as Lenny Bruce, were on the cutting edge of the limits to free speech and even faced criminal prosecution. Perhaps the height of comedic challenge to conventional authority took place during the "Chicago 7" trials of Abbey Hoffman and Jerry Rubin, a team of "yippies" with the timing of stand-up and the irreverence of a Borat.

In the name of free speech, I support Baron Cohen's right to unfairly pillory the Kazakh people and, by the way of unconscious caricature, the Jewish people. Philip Roth came up with much the same kind of over-the-top synthesis in his controversial novel Portnoy's Complaint, though, in fairness, he didn't subtitle it "Confessions of a Kazakh."

Many Jews, particularly the holders of the esteemed, priestly name of Cohen, will wish that this particular comic had chosen a stage name, as did other Jewish comics like Jack Benny, Danny Kaye, the Marx Brothers, Phyllis Diller, Milton Berle, Mel Brooks and Woody Allen. Incidentally, I decided to look up information about one modern comedian who is, to my mind, as funny as Baron Cohen, and found this intriguing entry on Robin Williams, whose Jewish accents always struck me as being too authentic to have been devised in adult life: "Perhaps as a defence against the bullying of his WASP classmates, Williams found himself gravitating towards the Jewish boys at the school. They were obvious targets of discrimination because of their background and that perhaps provided some common ground between them. Williams says, with some pride, that as an 'honorary Jew' he went to 14 bar mitzvahs in a single year. His new friends also provided him with a working knowledge of Yiddish which survives now in the words and phrases that sprinkle his conversations and his stage act."

Williams obviously chose to be the hyphen in the phrase Judeo-Christian. His humour often serves to bridge cultural differences, and certainly, at its edges, he is capable of a manic intensity equal to that of Baron Cohen, who has a hard time appearing on a talk show without dropping both pants and underwear.

The Anti-defamation League may have something to be concerned about with respect to Borat. This movie tricks people into revealing the racism, sexism and crudity in all human beings, then makes it look like their own ethnic quirk. Such chutzpah may well increase anti-Semitic sentiment, and that, I would submit, is not "good for the Jews."

Psychiatrist and poet Ron Charach regularly contributes to Canada's national newspapers. His eighth book, Selected Portraits, will be published next fall.

Opinions

A generation without Akedahs

We are the blessed generations. Canadian Baby Boomers and GenXers have it better than any other generations in history. No Holocaust, no Communism, no world wars, and no Great Depression. We take for granted unprecedented luxuries and technologies. Twenty-first century North America is a contemporary Garden of Eden.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

At its centre stands a culture of consumerism that worships the individual, catering to every possible appetite. Ad campaigns feature taglines such as "because you're worth it" and "for me, myself and I." Consumers are entertained and pampered. It's a great time to be alive.

Yet there's trouble in paradise. Even though life has vastly improved in the past century, research shows people are less happy than previous generations. (Greg Easterbrook has called this "the progress paradox.") Apparently, happy lives require more than "me, myself and I."

This "progress paradox" came to mind while reading the Biblical narrative of the Akedah, the binding of Isaac. Abraham is told by God to sacrifice his son Isaac, and he immediately sets out to comply with God's command.

Many find this narrative morally disturbing. How could God command Abraham to commit murder? But the text also disturbs us because it's so foreign. Abraham's self-sacrifice is out of place in a culture of self-centred consumerism. And that's precisely the problem.

The Akedah holds the answer to the "progress paradox." Without character, material comfort is meaningless. The self-sacrifice of the Akedah will hopefully never be necessary, yet the selflessness Abraham displayed is a basic ingredient to living a good life. Overindulgence is a series of empty comforts, but an altruistic sacrifice is not only meaningful, it actually makes you happier.

The Akedah's message needs to be heard more clearly. Wendy Mogel, a psychologist working with an affluent clientele, felt frustrated by problems that seemed to transcend her therapeutic techniques. She realized that her clients weren't suffering from psychological problems, but rather from parental overindulgence and overprotection. What they really needed were solid values to anchor their families. In response, she wrote a book titled The Blessings of a Skinned Knee: Using Jewish Teachings to Raise Self Reliant Children. Genuine happiness requires serious values that include antiquated notions such as self control and selflessness.

Yet these values are usually ignored. Some couples will refuse to have an additional child because it will dent their standard of living. They assume this will make them happy, yet this is a tragic mistake. By trading a baby for a BMW, they have performed a bizarre 21st-century Akedah. This faux Akedah is a recipe for a meaningless, materialistic life.

It's time to unravel the "progress paradox." We must learn that values are more important than vanity, and that noble sacrifices actually pay dividends.

It's time to shore up Jewish identity

Instinctively, we know that this brave new world of iPods, Playstations and Internet – for all its wonders – threatens traditional Jewish institutions and identity.

We understand that quality Jewish educational and cultural experiences provide essential first steps in any Jewish journey. We see how North American leisure culture diverts too many Jews from embracing their own heritage. The modern Jewish community must be more welcoming, fluid and creative. We must update our thinking. We can't afford to continue underfunding our Jewish educational system. Individual institutions are thriving – Herzliah Snowdon recently ranked number one among Quebec high schools – but without a massive reinvestment in Jewish education and identity-building, accompanied by a creative rethinking, our institutions – and community – risk sliding into future mediocrity.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Our community is at a crossroads. Canadians don't need a crystal ball. Looking south, the American Jewish community shows us what will happen if we allow the assimilation, ignorance and apathy to spread. Already, an honest communal self-examination would find many Jews disinterested, unaffiliated, and frequently alienated from the Jewish community. The fate of our children – and grandchildren – is in our hands.

We must invest boldly in identity-building educational and cultural programs, reaching out to the unaffiliated, energizing the already involved, making our community the toast of North America.

We need to invest in five critical gateways, five doors that welcome Jews in at various stages of the life cycle, and offer everyone in our community the quality experiences and meaningful engagement they want and deserve.

- Family programming: we must link critical institutions such as schools and synagogues with the family, the incubator for Jewish identity-building, while also creating annual leadership training programs for motivated adults.
- Jewish education: we must make a massive reinvestment in all our schools, especially our Jewish high schools – those primary laboratories for identity development – while also training a new generation of excellent teachers.
- Camps and youth programming require minimal capital investment compared to schools, but great camps and effective youth programs motivate young Jews at a critical developmental stage, allowing them to experience the 24/7 Judaism that research shows is most effective in building identity and fostering Jewish pride.
- Israel experience: we must further popularize the birthright israel program and March of the Living experience, and reinforce them with effective follow-up programming.
- In arts and culture, we must build world-class institutions and fund creative initiatives that stretch the souls and engage the imaginations of young and old alike.

Only one organization in Montreal can tackle this tremendous, expensive challenge, but doing so requires a paradigm shift. Traditionally, Federation CJA has aided the vulnerable. Today, Federation CJA must take responsibility for people whose Jewish connection is at risk. Many in our community, while physically comfortable, are Jewishly impoverished and are spiritually, intellectually, ideologically searching for direction, vision, passion and meaning within a Jewish framework. Our obligation to the needy remains strong, but, fortunately, other institutions also tend to Canadians' physical needs. However, if we don't build our community's Jewish identity and provide positive Jewish experiences for all Jewish Montrealers, who will?

Increasingly, federations throughout North America are taking responsibility for building the next generation of proud Jews – and Jewish donors. Boston's $45-million (US) Peerless Excellence Project in Jewish education invests in educational quality in carefully designated and coached schools. Cleveland, a Jewish community of 81,500 and a 2005 UJA campaign of $31 million, has launched a $137-million Centennial Fund, "to strengthen and grow Jewish Cleveland and make Jewish life more accessible," including a $20-million commitment to underwriting Jewish day school tuition. Toronto's $250-million "Tomorrow Campaign" will fund facilities and programs in three Jewish neighbourhoods.

In the 1980s, the Montreal Jewish community proved that it could survive. In the 1990s, Montreal proved that it could revive, raising $30 million to rebuild its central community campus. Having re-engineered the community hardware so successfully, it's now time for a software revolution. We need a dramatic investment in Jewish programming at all levels – from young to old, from religious to secular – in order to reach out to the culturally inclined, the politically active, the intellectually engaged, the spiritually seeking – whoever they maybe, wherever they may be.

History has proved that our children and grandchildren tomorrow will pay for the cost of inaction today. The time for dramatic action is now.

Abandoning agunot on a broken altar

If a man divorces his first wife, even the altar sheds tears.

On the very last page of the tractate Gittin (Bills of Divorcement), the Talmud presents us with this arresting image, in the name of Rabbi Eleazar. In the midst of exacting discussion of the technical parameters of divorce, and the ethical considerations of divorce, the rabbis don't lose track of the emotional repercussions of divorce.

In imagining the cold stones weeping, the rabbis find a poignant metaphor for the sense of loss and trauma that accompanies the unravelling of a marriage turned irredeemably sour. Enfolded in that image is the memory of a young and hopeful bride and bridegroom, and then the more somber afterimage of the estranged couple, each going his and her own way.

The image is deeply sad, of course. But at the same time, I believe that it subtly opens an avenue of comfort. At a time of profound aloneness, the altar weeps with the man, sharing in his sorrow, easing his burden. It weeps with the woman, too, and eases her burden as well. At heart, I see in this a symbol of divine caring that mitigates the sense of radical loneliness and points the way toward future possibilities.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

I thought of this image when I first learned of the abrupt cancellation of the planned international Orthodox rabbinical conference in Israel earlier this month to consider halachic approaches to the problem of the agunah, the "anchored" or "chained" woman, bound to a defunct marriage by a husband who refuses to issue a get, or writ of divorce. It was cancelled, according to the news coverage, because of fear of the undue influence of "feminists."

But the issue of agunot isn't a battle between feminists and traditionalists. It's a struggle within our tradition between the elements of ethics, compassion and Halachah, elements that should be allied but have – in this matter – become unglued. Agunot require a get to move on with their lives – to remarry, to have children. The inequity of roles in Jewish divorce leaves women vulnerable to financial extortion and other forced concessions. Or it pushes women outside of the community that consigns them to this state. For several decades, many women and men have seen this as one of the central issues that Halachah must address, and in a global and principled way, rather than ad hoc and case by case.

The women who exist in this limbo are not the only victims. If there are children from the marriage, they suffer, as well. Children taste the anguish of their parents, and the strain of ongoing animosity. The fabric of the community as a whole is damaged.

One Canadian and American solution to the problem of agunot is to use the civil courts to create disincentives for recalcitrant husbands to withhold a get. This approach is both clever and compassionate, but it's only imperfectly effective. Ironically, however, it's also an admission that Judaism has not solved the problem internally, that we must look to systems outside of Halachah in order to keep our halachic lives ethical.

As Chanukah approaches and we commemorate the chanukat habayit of our ancestors, the rededication of the ancient Temple and purification of the altar, we might think about putting our own bayit, our own house, in order. In our own communities, in the places we pray, study, and live Jewishly, we must always keep this issue in view, especially in the wake of the collapsed conference.

When a man divorces his first wife, even the altar sheds tears. When a man will not divorce his wife, even after the marriage is no longer viable – when a man leaves his wife an agunah – think of what the altar suffers. I imagine it cracked down its centre, shattered by a broken heart.

The Kirshner File

'A sucking chest wound for our country'

An explosive four-letter word with far-reaching ramifications – Iraq – dominated the mid-term congressional elections in the United States earlier this month. In a harsh reflection of the Bush administration's failures in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion and the ouster of Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime, the status quo was shattered and a new political era dawned in Washington.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Democratic party, having called for a fundamental shift in policy in the face of mounting U.S. casualties and escalating sectarian violence that threatens to tear that country asunder and push it closer to outright civil war and partition, defeated the Republicans and won control of the House of Representatives and the Senate for the first time since 1994.

President George W. Bush was thus put on notice that his handling of the war leaves much to be desired, while Donald Rumsfeld, the secretary of defence and one of the architects of the war, was forced to resign in disgrace. His replacement, Robert Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, has spoken of an exit strategy whose main feature would be a phased U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, a concept the Democrats have promoted, and still do.

As echoes of Vietnam reverberated in the halls of Congress, Bush, who triumphantly boasted three years ago that "major combat operations in Iraq are over," seemed contrite. "I'm open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's democratic government succeeds," he declared in a show of pragmatism and bravado.

And in a sign of humility, Bush promised not to prejudge the work of the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member bipartisan panel appointed by Congress last March to reassess U.S. strategy and scheduled to release its findings in December. Co-chaired by James Baker, the U.S. secretary of state during the 1991 Gulf War, the Iraq Study Group may yet make a difference. Baker, though reportedly having rejected an immediate or rapid withdrawal, believes that the current situation in Iraq is unsustainable, and that a solution should involve Syria and Iran, countries with which the Bush administration is at odds. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, a close Bush ally, agrees. In a recent speech, he advised Bush to engage Iran and Syria in a bid to defuse the spiralling chaos in Iraq.

Syria and Iran are indeed important players. Some of the insurgents in Iraq entered the country through Syria. As for Iran, it wields enormous influence by virtue of its ties with Iraqi Shiites, who dominate Iraq's government. Yet it is questionable whether Bush will turn for help to Syria and Iran, both of which he boycotts and views as dangerous destabilizing forces in the Middle East. Syria and Iran support Hezbollah, which triggered a war with Israel this past summer. Syria, despite its pullout from Lebanon in the spring of 2005, still meddles in Lebanese politics. Iran, which openly and unabashedly advocates Israel's destruction and denies the Holocaust, is intent on building a nuclear arsenal and thereby changing the balance of power in the Middle East.

It is unclear whether the American military, which is shouldering the burden of battling the Iraqi insurgency, shares the opinion that Syria and Iran must be brought into the equation to pacify Iraq. But Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has ordered a broad review of strategy.

The situation in Iraq is truly abysmal.

The insurgency, spearheaded by Iraqi Sunni Arabs and augmented by Shiite militias and foreign Islamic fighters, has increased in "scope, complexity and lethality," according to Gen. Michael Maples, the director of the Defence Intelligence Agency, a U.S. government body. Nearly 3,000 U.S. soldiers have been killed so far, and the toll is rising. The insurgency has claimed the lives of many more Iraqi policemen, and by one estimate, 3,000 civilians – men, women and children – are killed each month, the victims of mass suicide bombings and gangland-like shootings.

The United States promised to bring peace, stability, prosperity and democracy to Iraq, yet all but one of these objectives have fallen by the wayside. There have been free elections, but these exercises in Jeffersonian democracy have widened ethnic and religious fault lines between two warring groups, the Sunnis and the Shiites, who form a majority of Iraq's population.

Iraqis elected a transitional government in January 2005, and nine months later, they approved of a new constitution. Last December, they went to the polls yet again to elect a government with a four-year mandate. But as observers have noted, democracy has not yielded the desirable results. Voters have generally cast ballots for sectarian rather than religious parties, and now Sunnis and Shiites are further apart than ever.

After centuries of subjugation at the hands of the minority Sunnis, the Shiites are on the ascendancy, backed to the hilt by Iran. The Sunnis feel marginalized and like second-class citizens, all the more so because Iraq's fabulously rich oil fields are in Shiite and Kurdish areas. Sunnis are also bitter because they were dismissed from their positions when the old Iraqi army was disbanded. In retrospect, the Americans consider this to have been a mistake of monumental proportions. But the new army and the police force that the U.S. is in the process of building to fill the vacuum are riddled with incompetence, laxity and corruption.

U.S. President George W. Bush

Worse still, the Americans have failed to rein in Shiite death squads, which have terrorized the Sunni community. Nor have they subdued Moktada al-Sadr's Madhi Army, which has staged two uprisings. Furthermore, the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, has been a great disappointment. American officials have blamed him for not having acted decisively enough to curb tribal sectarian violence, dismantle Shiite militias, eliminate rampant corruption and improve public services, which have yet to be brought up to prewar levels.

These problems, which have turned Iraq into a dysfunctional state, cannot be resolved unless the insurgency is ruthlessly crushed. But with only 140,000 troops in Iraq, the Americans will be fortunate if they can merely contain the uprising. In the meantime, though, the western presence has ironically transformed Iraq into a base of jihadist terrorism. Prior to the invasion, the Bush administration claimed that there was a link between Saddam and Al Qaeda, which was untrue. But now there is a connection, as the Iraqi branch of Al Qaeda appears to be growing stronger.

To their credit, the Americans have chalked up some notable successes in combating the insurgency, having killed Saddam's two sons and local Al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarkawi. Saddam himself, a symbol of everything that was awful about prewar Iraq, was captured, and now he has been convicted of murder and may yet be executed. But these milestones in the U.S. campaign to reshape Iraq, and by extension the Arab world, have been only blips on the screen.

It may well be that the Bush administration – which still seeks a military victory against the insurgents, a goal deemed impossible by Henry Kissinger, the former U.S. secretary of state – may well have to redefine its principal objective in Iraq from democracy to stability.

The burning question is how it can be achieved within the parameters of current conditions. In Washington, the debate is in full swing. The Democrats, led by Senator Carl Levin, are pressing for a phased withdrawal to spur the Iraqi government and budding armed forces to take responsibility for rebuilding the country and fighting the insurgency. As Levin caustically put it, "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves."

Bush opposes "artificial timetables set by politicians in Washington" and is adamant that no withdrawal can be realistically possible until the Iraqis can take over. His Republican ally, Senator John McCain, a 2008 presidential hopeful, argues that American troop strength in Iraq must be increased by 20,000 to bring restive Baghdad and Anbar province to heel. The alternative, he has warned, would be humiliation for the United States and disaster for Iraq. The commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, Gen. John Abizaid, concurs with McCain's assessment, as do a number of retired generals who have been critical of Bush's management of the war.

Certainly, Israel has a huge stake in the outcome of the current debate. A pro-western, stable Iraq would patently be in Israel's interests. But an Iraq that aligns itself with Iran would be an unmitigated catastrophe for Israel, the United States and moderate Arab regimes. So it came as no surprise that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, during his recent visit to Washington, warned of the dangers of a hasty U.S. withdrawal. Yet there is little doubt that the United States is contemplating a pullout. Iraq, New York Times foreign affairs columnist Thomas Friedman wrote recently, has "turned into a sucking chest wound for our country."

Peace process done for now, Israeli analyst says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's peace process with the Palestinians is dead and may not be revived for many years to come, according to an Israeli strategist.

"It has run its course," says Chuck Freilich, who was Israel's deputy national security advisor from 2000 until last year.

Advising Israel to focus its attention on "conflict management" rather than on "conflict resolution," he said, "We have to live with the status quo."

Freilich, here last week under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, noted in an interview that Israel has four alternatives in dealing with the Palestinians.

It can try to topple the current Hamas government, which refuses to renounce terrorism, recognize Israel or accept previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority.

But this is not a viable option, because the ouster of the Hamas regime could usher in a period of "total chaos," which would not be in Israel's interests, said Freilich, now a senior fellow at Harvard University, where he is writing a book on Israeli national security decision-making.

Alternatively, Israel could attempt to bypass Hamas and work exclusively with the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas.

But Abbas lacks the capability to deliver a ceasefire, much less a peace agreement, said Freilich, who was once a senior analyst at Israel's ministry of defence.

At best, Abbas might be able to reduce the level of friction, Freilich said.

Israel could also opt for more unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank, but this method has been discredited.

"We withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000 and from the Gaza Strip in 2005, but all we got in return were Katyushas and Qassams," he said in a reference to Israel's month-long war with Hezbollah last summer and current Palestinian cross-border attacks against Israeli kibbutzim and towns.

That leaves Israel with no choice but to resign itself to the present situation, Freilich said.

Asked whether Israel should consider Hamas' offer for a long-term truce, Freilich replied, "If they want a ceasefire, they can have it, but they would have to stop firing Qassams."

Hamas has offered Israel a lengthy truce if it pulls back to the pre-1967 border and helps resolve the Palestinian refugee problem.

Freilich rejected these conditions and, focusing on the territorial issue, said, "No one seriously thinks that Israel should withdraw to the old lines."

He added that the Palestinians could have won back 90 per cent of the West Bank had their late leader, Yasser Arafat, accepted Israel's offer at the Camp David summit in July 2000. "Arafat rejected an incredible deal."

Turning to Israel's recent war in Lebanon, he predicted that a second round is inevitable because Hezbollah is a jihadist organization hell-bent on wiping out Israel. "Sooner or later, it will happen," said Freilich, who was in Toronto in support of Project Northern Recovery, a campaign to rebuild the Galilee in the wake of that conflict.

He cast aspersions on the international force that patrols Israel's border with Lebanon, saying it's simply not capable of preventing another war.

In his view, both the Israeli government and the army performed poorly during the war. "We blew it on all levels. It was just a very bad show."

The cabinet neither set clear objectives nor conveyed clear-cut commands to the army, he said.

Although Israel was not surprised by Hezbollah's massive missile arsenal, it seemed to have been caught off guard by the ferocity of its attacks.

"We were too focused on the West Bank and Iran," he said, referring to the ongoing violence in the territories and Iran's quest to attain an atomic bomb.

Freilich said that while it failed to crush Hezbollah, Israel did not lose the war and, in fact, succeeded in degrading Hezbollah's stock of long-range missiles.

In a critique of Gen. Dan Halutz, the chief of staff and former commander of the air force, Freilich said that he relied too heavily on air power.

Israel should "gone all-out" in its offensive against Hezbollah, said Freilich, who served in the Israel Defence Forces for five years and is now a major in the reserves.

He said that Hezbollah may yet end up stronger than it was before the war if it manages to become "a primary force" in Lebanese politics.

But at present, Hezbollah is weaker, he claimed. "They took a significant hit in the war."

Freilich cast doubt on the theory that Israel can stabilize its relations with Lebanon if it agrees to relinquish the disputed Shebaa Farms area, which Hezbollah claims is Lebanese rather than Syrian territory.

"It's a canard, an excuse for Hezbollah to attack Israel. Hezbollah has a long list of many more demands."

Freilich said that a resumption of bilateral negotiations with Syria over the fate of the Golan Heights may be a worthwhile exercise, but only if the Syrians are ready for a warm relationship and not a "cold peace" with Israel.

Iran should be offered a broad range of inducements to give up its militarized nuclear program. But Freilich doesn't think diplomacy will ultimately work.

Military force may be the only language Iran understands, he said.

Asked if Israel should launch an aerial assault on Iran's nuclear installations, Freilich hesitated, then said, "Israel will do what it has to do."

If Iran becomes a nuclear power, the balance of power in the Middle East will change to Israel's detriment, he commented.

In his opinion, Iran is now the greatest strategic threat Israel faces. "But the issue goes beyond Israel," he argued, saying that a nuclear-armed Iran poses a danger to each and every nation in the Middle East.

Jews have reached serious crossroads: Hoenlein

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The man who heads the most powerful Jewish organization in the United States issued a dire warning last week, saying that Jews have reached "the most serious crossroads" in their history since the bitter days of the Holocaust.

Alluding to the fateful year prior to Adolf Hitler's accession to power in Germany, Malcolm Hoenlein declared, "It's looking more and more like 1932."

In a doom-and-gloom speech punctuated by flashes of hope, the executive vice-chairman of the New York-based Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations urged his audience "to face realities" in order to overcome the "tremendous challenges" confronting Jews – and Israel – today.

Delivering the third Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season at Holy Blossom Temple, Hoenlein said Jews are duty-bound to assess, confront and debate the threats to their well-being.

In a wide-ranging speech that sounded like a pep talk and a wakeup call, Hoenlein – a modern Orthodox Jew – suggested that today's anti-Israel and anti-Semitic manifestations percolated to the surface at the UN-Sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa in September 2001.

"The blueprint of the Durban conference is being implemented," he said, his voice rising and falling. "There is a worldwide campaign to delegitimize Israel and intimidate Jews."

Saying that a new world war of values has broken out, Hoenlein defined it as an international struggle pitting the forces of democracy – for which Jews stand – against the forces of totalitarianism.

"This war will determine our future. But there are people who don't want to face up to it."

He said that decisions Jews make today in response to these challenges will affect their children and grandchildren.

Cataloguing the dangers that loom on the horizon, Hoenlein mentioned the prospect that weapons of mass destruction may fall into the hands of rogue regimes, and he talked of the rising tide of terrorism, the possibility that Jews may be squeezed out of Europe by its rising Muslim population, and that anti-Israel voices in the United States are fixated on what they describe as the "Zionist lobby." He also compared Iran's Holocaust-denying president to Hitler.

As he zeroed on in these themes, and denied that Israel lost last summer's war in Lebanon, Hoenlein laid special emphasis on Europe's growing Muslim population and what it may mean to Jews in the future and on Iran.

Asserting that 40 per cent of the babies born in Europe today are Muslims, and that 70 per cent of European Muslims are under the age of 30, he lamented that Muslim ghettos there have become "no-go" zones.

He also said that Jews wearing kippot dare not walk the streets of most European capitals out of fear of being assaulted.

Synagogues in Europe are constantly targeted, and in Britain alone, 100 shuls have been attacked and two destroyed, in the past four years.

As well, he added, universities in Britain have grown increasingly "inhospitable" to Jewish students.

"Jews will have no future in Europe," he said in an apocalyptic tone.

Hoenlein accused European governments of practising a policy of "appeasement and accommodation" toward Iran. Observing that this tactic will not work, he compared it to Europe's stance toward Nazi Germany in the 1930s.

Malcolm Hoenlein
[File photo]

In a sombre commentary on the West's war on terrorism, he spoke of terror plots being uncovered and of anti-terrorist trials now unfolding in Britain.

The war on terrorism is not anti-Islamic, he said.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, should be taken at his word when he lashes out at and threatens to destroy Israel. "He means what he says and says what he means."

Hoenlein claimed that the majority of Iranians would back a western campaign to change the current Islamic regime in Iran.

"Eighty five per cent of Iranians don't support Ahmadinejad," he said, without providing evidence.

Proclaiming that Iran should be subjected to economic sanctions, he assured his listeners that such measures can work. "We could cut them off. Let them drink their oil."

Saying that Iran's goal is to extend its hegemony across the Middle East, Hoenlein warned that the Iranians are moving ahead quickly with plans to build nuclear weapons.

Hoenlein said he sees no reason why Jews should not prevail in meeting these challenges.

"Did anyone think we'd free the Jews of the Soviet Union, Ethiopia and Yemen?" asked Hoenlein, who earlier in his career was the founding director of the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry.

Calling on Jews to put aside their differences, he urged them to educate their children, convey their concerns to politicians and write letters to newspapers.

He concluded with the potentially uplifting message that amid the darkness, a better and safer world is possible.

Shlomo Riskin urges intra-communal dialogue

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin offers a message that is rarely heard in Orthodox circles these days – at least not publicly.

"All of a sudden you can't dialogue. If you speak to someone from another side, you're giving him legitimacy. How absurd! That means you can only speak to someone you agree with?" asked the Efrat-based rabbi last week at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, in response to an audience question about Orthodox isolationism.

Referring to a change in attitude since he made aliyah 23 years ago, the 66-year-old founding rabbi of New York's Lincoln Square Synagogue – now the rabbi of Efrat, a settlement of more than 12,000 people in Judea, and dean of its Ohr Torah Stone Colleges and graduate programs – said that when he lived in the United States, he was "constantly" in dialogue with Conservative and Reform Jews as well as Christians.

Even today, Rabbi Riskin – a Yeshiva University alumnus who received ordination from Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik and who was referred to as a "distinguished rav" and a "rabbi's rabbi" in an introduction by Rabbi Baruch Taub – always accepts "with alacrity" invitations to speak at places like Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem, the Reform movement's seminary in Israel.

"It's always interesting to hear what other people have to say, and I feel very secure in my Orthodoxy," Rabbi Riskin said.

The rabbi was in town to speak about "The Contribution, the Problems and the Future of the National Religious Community in Israel." His talk was co-sponsored by the congregation's adult education committee and Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin

Rabbi Riskin praised Mizrachi, as a political party, for ensuring that from the time the Jewish state was established in 1948, "Yiddishkeit" would be a hallmark. He cited as examples kashrut policies in state institutions, and having Shabbat and Jewish festivals as days of rest.

But he was critical of the religious Zionist movement, particularly its Orthodox settlers, for having built a thriving educational network only for those who share their religious perspective. However, he added, they "did not worry about Klal Yisrael." He noted that the settlements' importance is the major platform of Mafdal, Mizrachi's political party.

Rabbi Riskin said he is now dealing with Israel's ministry of education in the hope of establishing a junior high and high school for both religious and non-religious students.

There is at least one other such school in Israel, located in Modi'in, but they are exceedingly rare.

Although there are some mixed settlements and some like his own without "acceptance committees," he said that most settlements defer to such committees by accepting into their communities only those who are halachically observant.

He noted that in a 2003 study by the Rishon LeZion College of Administration, Palestinians and settlers were the top two categories who were "most disliked," in contrast to the "adulation" he recalls for settlers at the time of his aliyah.

He believes that the time has come for Mizrachi to separate its political party, Mafdal, from its "religious, ethical, ideological movement." While such a political party may have been "mandatory" when Israel became a state, he believes that today it's "counterproductive.

"A religion that attempts to legislate religious laws is seen as being unfairly coercive," he said.

Currently, in Israel, he said, the political party and the religious movement, are seen as "one and the same."

"What we have created is a magnificent network for the religious," he said. "In the meantime non-religious Israelis were going to the other end of the spectrum, and religious Jewry seemingly did not care."

Mizrachi "must reach out to every Jew," said Rabbi Riskin. He believes the majority of Israelis are "willing to be touched by religion" but not to be coerced. He noted that this year, on Yom Kippur, 70,000 non-religious Israelis gathered in more than 300 Jewish centres in Israel in an attempt to learn more about observing the holiday. The centres were opened specifically to address the needs of Jews who "wouldn't go to shul, because they identify the shul with power."

The Torah is "too important to be left for the Orthodox alone," said the rabbi.

"It's not all or nothing," he cautioned. "Because nobody is all or nothing. Each one knows in his own heart the compromises he or she makes.

"God had a covenant with the entire Jewish people."

Balancing self and God

By RABBI EDWARD ELKIN

Parshat Vayetzei picks up at the point where Jacob is fleeing from the murderous wrath of his brother Esau.

All alone, away from his home and family for the first time, embarking on a dangerous journey to a new place, Jacob comes to a place where he decides to take a rest. There he falls asleep and has the famous dream of the ladder set on the ground with its top in the heavens and angels going up and down on it. The Lord stands next to him and reiterates the promise given to Abraham and Isaac that the Land of Israel would belong to him and his descendants, and God promises to protect him and bring him back to his home one day.

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

When Jacob wakes, he exclaims, "Achen yesh Adoshem bamakom hazeh ve'anochi lo yadati" ("Surely the Lord is present in this place, and I did not know it!").

Many of our commentators notice something unusual about the Hebrew phrase "anochi lo yadati." In Hebrew, the first person singular past tense is expressed through the "ti" ending of the word yadati. Therefore, the text didn't actually need to say anochi ("I"). In order to express the idea "I didn't know it," all the Torah needed to say was lo yadati. So why the extra word anochi?

Reb Shlomo of Radomsk, in his commentary Tiferet Shlomo, proposes an interesting (if not terribly grammatical) answer. Anochi in this verse, he teaches, is not in fact the subject, but actually the object of the phrase, and it refers to Jacob's ego. Why did this amazing divine manifestation occur to Jacob at this particular time? It happened because at this turning point in his life, Jacob was able to utterly disregard his own ego, his own self. "Anochi lo yadati" in this interpretation should be translated as "I didn't regard myself" or even "I obliterated myself." Every part of Jacob, body and soul, was directed instead toward the Lord. That ability to transcend himself and his own needs is what brought God so dramatically into his life through the ladder dream.

People can't disregard their own needs forever. Upon waking, Jacob will proceed on his journey, marry, raise a large family, and become quite materially successful. All these things require an ego. They require a regard for one's own needs that is not consistent with Reb Shlomo's understanding of "anochi lo yadati."

But this is not a bad thing. The goal is not to spend one's entire life so focused on God that one's self disappears. We couldn't live for long with an obliterated self. But neither is the goal to live a life of self-absorption or a life lived around the principle of "look out for No. 1" with no room for God at all.

Ideally, we live our lives going back and forth between moments of ego gratification and moments of ego denial, with each informing the other and helping us to grow as balanced human beings. For most of us, gratification comes a lot more easily and naturally than denial. So we have much to learn from Jacob's disregard for the self in this week's sedra. It's something we can learn from, even if we, like Jacob himself, don't aspire to live our whole lives that way.

There is something about the experience of periodically disregarding the self and with utter trust opening ourselves up completely to God that can move us to a different spiritual place.

It's from that place that we can grow and change and gain the confidence and faith to do what we need to do in this world.

Chanukah and Jewish leadership

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Chanukah is approaching and we are again preparing our chanukiyot for candles and starting to build anticipation with our families. We plan the parties and get the chocolate coins ready for the dreidel games. We sing about a great victory, where the many were overtaken by the few and how Jewish unity carried the day.

Midrashic Moments

The holiday of Chanukah also gave us innovations within Jewish law that go largely unrecognized. Until that battle, it was not permitted to fight on the Sabbath. The book of the Maccabees describes a group of righteous Jews who fled into the desert to quietly observe Judaism. The king sent soldiers to attack them and the soldiers prepared to launch their attack on the Sabbath. The Jews decided that they will not profane the Sabbath, but will die pure. They were all slaughtered.

Once the enemy realized this fact, Sabbath attacks could become a newfound weapon. It was the Maccabees, a family of priests, who enacted an amendment to Jewish law that permitted Jews to fight on the Sabbath. They reasoned that if they chose to do what their brethren did in the desert, "they will soon destroy us from the Earth." Immediately after enacting this amendment, they are joined by a group of Chassidim – "valiant Israelites, devout followers of the law" – in other words, the legal initiative was accepted by all.

There are times when Jewish leadership has meant taking bold legal stands that are unheard of up to that moment. We are very familiar with the Maccabees as warriors and unifiers of the Jewish people. We are less aware of them as legal innovators, and yet, Jewish leadership involves viewing the full picture and not merely addressing things in isolation.

By and large, Jews acknowledge that the Jewish people, the Torah – depicting covenant and commandments – as well as the Land of Israel are all components of one composite. We can't separate one element from the others without feeling incomplete and confused. In recent times we have understood this fact when people who verbally attack Israel and Zionism have tried to separate those attacks from the category of anti-Semitism. The Jewish world knows that these areas cannot be separated.

The leadership of the Hasmoneans understood the same thing in terms of unity and composition. The rallying cry of the Maccabees, "Whoever is for God should join me," didn't distinguish one category of Jew from another. And we must remember that there have always been varying factions within Judaism. Unity did not only include separate factions, but the narratives that remain of the Hasmonean events depict stories of women who were equally engaged in the protection of Judaism and its values. Even the story of Judith, although set in another time, is widely recognized as conveying a narrative of Chanukah. Jewish unity is only strong when the invitation for inclusion recognizes the bottom-line priority: engaging with God. The nuances of that engagement are not to be determined when there is an enemy at the doorstep.

Chanukah portrays Jewish leadership as an area in which priorities are realized and addressed. Jewish unity is paramount. Jewish innovation is necessary for survival, and faith in, and commitment to, God and covenant are key. Jewish leadership is complex, in that it can't separate areas for leadership – it must include them all. It might be easy to resort to a strict and ardent rule of law in order to cover all the bases. There is so much at stake and it's such a complex task, perhaps the safest and best thing would be to shut the doors of innovation and unity in favour of a dictatorial and strict approach.

But then the Talmud clearly states: "When a leader dominates over a community, the Holy One weeps every day because of him."

The Dead Sea Scrolls: a personal perspective

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

When people are asked to name the most important archeological discovery of the past century, they inevitably answer the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Yet the scrolls are only part of a number of major archeological discoveries dealing with the Bible that have fascinated those interested in the field.

What is interesting about these finds is the way they were made. Many were discovered by illiterate peasants who, although they knew nothing about archeology and the Bible, knew their own terrain in minute detail. Such was the case with the Dead Sea Scrolls.

My own interest in the scrolls began as a young boy living in Israel who was fascinated by archeology. When my family moved to Canada, my fascination grew and provided me with a source of Jewish identity. University gave me a chance to explore these interests in a more formal fashion, and my career provided me with an opportunity to make others aware of this fascinating material.

It was during the time of the Camp David Accords between Israel and Egypt that I first got an opportunity to delve into the story of the Dead Sea Scrolls in detail, and to speak to some of the people who played a crucial role in their study. At the time, I was teaching a course in archeology at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies, as well as preparing a documentary series on major manuscript discoveries, titled The Romance of Lost Scripts, for Ideas on CBC Radio. Needless to say, the Dead Sea Scrolls would feature prominently in the series.

One of the key figures in the ongoing saga of the scrolls was the eminent Israeli archeologist, Yigael Yadin, who was head of the Institute of Archeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Yadin enjoyed a fabled career. He was head of the Haganah during the War of Independence, and at the time of the Camp David Accords, he was deputy prime minister of Israel. His father, Eliezer Sukenik was one of the first professors of archeology at Hebrew U, and he was also one of the first people to get a batch of the scrolls and to recognize their importance.

This happened on Nov. 27, 1947, the day the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into an Arab and a Jewish state. What a miraculous irony that the scrolls, which had disappeared when the last Jewish state was destroyed by the Romans, would reappear on exactly the day, almost 1,900 years later, when it was announced that a new Jewish state would be created.

I decided to try to contact Yadin right at the time he was involved in negotiating the Camp David Accords – not exactly the best time to try to reach a very busy man. I was in Florida at the time and couldn't fall asleep one night, so on a whim, I thought I would try to call the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem directly.

Imagine my surprise when I somehow managed to get through to Yadin's secretary, a Mrs. Bailey, who said he would be delighted to be interviewed on the scrolls, as opposed to the vexatious issues of Middle East politics. Coincidentally, she told me that he would be coming to Canada within a few weeks.

The interview went very well, and I was able to get the untold story of some of Yadin's exploits with the scrolls for my show.

At that time, the editor of the Dead Sea Scrolls publication project was Pere Pierre Benoit of the École Biblique Dominicain in Jerusalem, who had succeeded the legendary Pere Roland de Vaux. It was ironic that the men who headed the project delving into one of the most important aspects of Jewish history were Catholic priests. Today, all that has changed, and the scrolls are now under the control of the Israeli Antiquities Authority.

Now that we've talked about the past, let's move forward into the future. The Israeli Antiquities Authority has just been registered as a Canadian charity and has approached me for help in bringing the Dead Sea Scrolls to Canada, starting with a blockbuster exhibit at the new addition to the Royal Ontario Museum. Negotiations have begun. Stay tuned to this column for more information.

Dreidels – clay and otherwise

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Whether yours is made of clay and little or from silver and big, Chanukah's four-sided top never fails to instill lovely memories in children and bring back delightful ones in the not-so-young. There are so many wonderful pages devoted to dreidels on the Web. Today, the best ones.

How did the dreidel – or sevivon - become associated with the holiday of Chanukah? The World Zionist Organization site mentions one explanation. "One anecdote recalls the dreidel from the times when the Syrians prohibited the Jews from studying Torah. When the Syrians saw a group of Jews together, they checked to see that they were not studying. The Jews would hide their books and take out their dreidels and trick the Syrians into thinking they were just playing a game." [http://tinyurl.com/yf6h9o]

David Golinkin disagrees. The president of Jerusalem's Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies says explanations like the one above were "invented after the fact. The dreidel game originally had nothing to do with Chanukah" and similar games had "been played by various people in various languages for many centuries." [http://tinyurl.com/d9bc8]

Regardless, the dreidel is now a firmly entrenched and beloved tradition that has even developed a mystical side. Lee Ratzan suggests that like a dreidel, "the human spirit has four primary attributes: self (soul, nefesh), body (guf), reason (sechel) and everything (by extension, evil, hakol). When the dreidel is spun, the four sides can no longer be distinguished and blend into a harmonious oneness about a single infinite point. Spinning the dreidel is a symbolic act of striving for that harmony." [http://tinyurl.com/yhcpuj]

If you think you know exactly what a dreidel looks like, pay a visit to Eran Grebler's Draydel-House for dozens of delightful designs. [www.draydelhouse.com] Marsha Plafkin's Braille Dreidel is a simple yet striking variation. [http://tinyurl.com/v2j8c]

If you are inspired to make your own dreidel, you can make one out of paper. [http://tinyurl.com/68f27] Oh, and if you've never had a little dreidel (and made it out of clay), it's not too late! Just follow the instructions at ehow.com. [http://tinyurl.com/yfo2hd] I came across an advanced mathematical discussion looking at probability and the dreidel. [http://tinyurl.com/yxnpk3]

Nothing can replace that visceral thrill of spinning your own dreidel. But since everything seems to have gone high-tech these days, you can try your luck on your computer with some virtual dreidels. My favourite is the delightful one at the Jewish Outreach Institute. [www.joi.org/dreidel]

I found a couple of online game that should also please dreidel lovers. The Dreidel Slide Puzzle challenges you to unscramble the pieces to make a picture of a dreidel. [http://tinyurl.com/ydoeyj] Once you've solved that, try the elegant yet challenging dreidel jigsaw puzzle. [http://tinyurl.com/yyfhzk]

Although the classic Chanukah foods are latkes and the jelly-filled sufganiyot, there's no reason you can't indulge your passion for dreidels. Try out Candy Dreidels [http://tinyurl.com/ydkpmn], Dreidel Cookies [http://tinyurl.com/srcmf] some Dreidel Toast [http://tinyurl.com/yykdhk] and Fruity Dreidels that make good use of strawberries, bananas and canned pears. [http://tinyurl.com/vpy78]

What would Chanukah be without the music? Some of the holiday's sweetest tunes pay homage to the little toy. Sing along to Sevivon, Sov, Sov, Sov and I Have a Little Dreidel. [http://tinyurl.com/y6x92m]

Everybody's favourite little dreidel is (we know!) made of clay. But if you want a new dreidel to sing about, look no further than the Hava Nashira Jewish Songleader's Resource. There are dozens of modern variations of the classic, including:

- I have a little dreidel, I made it from cement.
- And now our lovely hardwood floor has a nasty dent.
- I have a little dreidel, I made it out of glue.
- The baby tried to spin it, and now she's spinning, too.
- I have a little dreidel, made from a CD-ROM.

It helped me launch a startup called DreidelSpin-dot-com! [http://ot006.urj.net/dreidl.htm]

Play about Rachel Corrie may open here in 2007

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A controversial play about Rachel Corrie, a young American activist who was killed after being run over by an Israeli bulldozer in 2003, is likely to open in Toronto next year.

Martin Bragg, the artistic producer of CanStage, a Toronto-based theatre company, is negotiating the rights to My Name is Rachel Corrie, a play co-edited by the Guardian's former editor Katherine Viner and directed and co-edited by actor Alan Rickman, the British actor who starred in films such as Truly, Madly, Deeply and as Severus Snape in the Harry Potter series.

If CanStage is successful in obtaining the rights, the play will be staged in the 2007-08 season.

The play, which is based on Corrie's e-mails, letters and journal entries, had two sold-out runs in London at the Royal Court Theatre in 2005, and one in New York is running until the end of December at the off-Broadway Minetta Lane Theatre.

The theatre acquired the rights after James Nicola, the artistic director of the New York Theatre Workshop, postponed his production, which was eventually cancelled, reportedly because of pressure from Jewish groups who felt the play was anti-Israel and anti-Semitic.

Since Corrie's death three years ago, the 23-year-old woman from Olympia, Wash., who travelled to Rafah in the Gaza Strip as a member of of the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement, has been immortalized as a symbol of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Depending on what side of the conflict you're on, Corrie is seen either as an idealistic, naïve girl who slipped in front of a bulldozer while interfering with the Israeli army when it was trying to destroy tunnels used by terrorists to smuggle weapons, or she was a courageous martyr who was murdered trying to protect the home of an innocent Palestinian refugee.

Despite the controversial way Corrie died, Bragg said the play is not anti-Israeli propaganda, but a portrayal of an extraordinary woman's journey.

"For me, it was just a really fascinating journey of how some privileged 23-year-old kid from Seattle [sic], Washington – what it was that drove her to that experience in Gaza," said Bragg, who has read the script and will see the play in New York before its run ends.

"I have a son in university and I have a 17-year-old daughter. I was really moved as a parent by the end of it. I wasn't judgmental at all," he said, adding that he doesn't think of it as "political-based theatre."

But Jonathan Tobin, the executive editor of the Philadelphia Jewish Exponent who wrote an article called "Rachel Corrie was a liar," criticized the political one-sidedness of the play.

"She is portrayed as a sensitive American kid who went off to Gaza, where she wound up questioning her belief in the humanity of the Israelis who were battling her Palestinian pals. Seen through Corrie's peculiar tunnel vision, Israel is an evil power whose only purpose seems to be to make nonviolent Palestinian Arabs miserable."

Although Bragg said the play is not political, a number of excerpts from the play about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict suggest otherwise.

"The vast majority of Palestinians right now, as far as I can tell, are engaging in Gandhian non-violent resistance," Corrie says in the play.

"What we [Americans] are paying for here [in Israel] is truly evil… I'm really scared, and questioning my fundamental belief in the goodness of human nature. This has to stop."

In one scene, Corrie speaks to her mother on the phone and tells her what to tell journalists about her experiences in Rafah.

"If you talk about the cycle of violence, or 'an eye for an eye,' you could be perpetuating the idea that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a balanced conflict, instead of a largely unarmed people against the fourth most powerful military in the world."

When talking about Palestinian refugees, she says, "I wonder if you can forgive the world for all the years spent existing – just existing – in resistance to the constant attempt to erase you from your home."

Bragg said that since the news broke that CanStage is negotiating for the rights to the play, he has only received one complaint from a subscriber who said CanStage's decision to produce the play will influence that person's decision to subscribe again next year.

"The interesting thing about it is that most of the people [who oppose the play] are operating on what I would call the hysteria level. They have not seen the play, they have not read the play, they are dealing with assumptions," Bragg said.

"I am not anticipating a level of protest. We are a very tolerant society," he said.

Alicia Richler, associate director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee, said that although everyone in Canada has the right to free speech, the timing of the news is poor, since an Israeli man was recently killed when a rocket launched from the northern Gaza Strip hit a factory in Sderot.

My Name is Rachel Corrie recalls "the days of Athenian drama, when theatre was used to achieve a political end," Richler said.

"While CIC has no comment on the artistic merits of the show, it is unfortunate that a Canadian theatre company would choose to produce a play that draws attention away from the real victims in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Israeli foundation helps victims of terror

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israelis have experienced more than their share of death and destruction at the hands of terrorists, but for years the feelings that go along with such loss have been suppressed. Today, however, "the country is coming out of an emotional freeze," said Sherri Mandell, herself the victim of terror. "We're part of it."

Mandell, whose son Koby (Yaakov) was bludgeoned to death in a cave near their West Bank home in Tekoa, has created the Koby Mandell Foundation to maintain her son's memory and to assist others to deal with the loss of loved ones.

"We are speaking a language that they are just beginning to hear – the language of feeling," she said.

Koby, along with his friend Yosef Ish-Ran, were killed in May 2001 after playing hooky from school and going on a hike in the gorge near Tekoa. They were found in a cave a day later, beaten to death. Dental records were required to identify the bodies.

> 'We are speaking a language that they are just beginning to hear – the language of feeling'

Needless to say, Sherri Mandell was devastated by her son's murder. She describes her spiritual journey in coping with the tragedy in The Blessing of a Broken Heart, a work that won the National Jewish Book Award of the Jewish Book Council.

She and her husband Seth set up the Koby Mandell Foundation (www.kobymandell.org), a privately funded organization with a budget of around $1.5 million (US) that operates programs for those who have lost a close family member to terror. She was in Toronto recently to meet with Canadian Friends of the Koby Mandell Foundation, increase the organizations' profile and to solicit financial aid for its work.

This week she will be in New York for a fundraising dinner that will honour baseball legend Willie Randolph, one of the first black managers in the major leagues.

Koby, who spent many of his early years in the United States, was a baseball fan who idolized Cal Ripken Jr. and who played baseball for a little league team in Tekoa. Ripken, who set the major league record for most consecutive games played, appeared at the first foundation fundraiser a year ago and helped create awareness for the organization.

Mandell was effusive in her admiration for Ripken, saying his participation opened doors that would otherwise have remained shut for the foundation.

Money raised at the Manhattan fundraiser will go to support the organization's work of providing assistance to those who have suffered personal loss and maintaining "the healing community" established by the foundation.

The foundation operates youth camps during Chanukah and Pesach, with 300 kids attending each session. The camps provide healing activities like hiking, yoga and art therapy and guided imagery therapy. Children have fun while learning to express their emotions.

Other foundation programs include a mother's retreat, a family healing retreat, a big brother/big sister program, and a young adult friendship program.

"Children," Mandell said, "really are the silent victims." They are faced for the first time with purposeful evil that has taken from them a loved one, and sometimes their family tries to shield them from that reality. At the Chanukah camp last year, a nine-year-old girl at a Shabbat program told the other campers the story of her mother's death. Her mom was driving a car in front of a bus in which the girl was riding, when her mother was shot and wounded and taken alive to the hospital. Her father and grandmother were able to visit her but her mom died before the little girl could see her.

Another little girl sitting next to her turned to Mandell and said the same thing happened to her. "'I didn't get to go,'" the little girl said.

"I think they feel left out."

Mandell said Israelis have for years dealt with the grief of losing loved ones, but the foundation provides the mechanism to "process" the feelings.

"If you can take the pain and transform it into something giving...

"Sadness has to be transformed into something positive. You can't just sit in grief or else it will kill you or make you sick," Mandell said.

Her own experience of losing her first-born (she has three younger children) was so intense, she compared it to becoming "a dead person.

"When you have a murder in the family, you are dead. At first you feel like you want to die. You live in another world. I didn't want to eat.

"People would bring me food and 'ugh, not for me. I'm not in the world.'

"It's hard. You have to pretend everything is okay."

Mandell said she received advice from others who experienced similar loss and she avoided the fairly common pattern of masking sorrow with tranquillizers and sleeping pills.

She was assisted by a friend who is a counsellor and who taught her "what you're feeling is okay. She gave me permission to feel."

Making her smile this summer was our task. Changing her life is our commitment.

For five weeks, Kamilla Rosenblum and her single mother endured bombardment in Nahariya. Only when New Israel Fund programs allowed her to travel south – and enjoy her fifth birthday party – did the smile return to her face.

Kamilla and her family are not alone. Millions of "invisible Israelis" have suffered from years of budget cuts and government indifference to the needs of the North and the Negev – Israel's periphery, geographically and psychologically.

But for 27 years, the New Israel Fund has been there. Not to distribute handouts, but to build communities, train leaders, and help democracy grow. Just about every socially oriented NGO in Israel has been founded with the assistance of or trained by the New Israel Fund and its action arm, SHATIL.

Now, in the war's aftermath, our programs are ensuring that reconstruction money is distributed fairly. That small business owners are not neglected. That new immigrants and Israeli Arabs are part of the rebuilding of the Galil. And that the powerless can find their voice to remind the powerful of their needs and their communities.

On human rights, on social justice, on the environment, on religious pluralism, the New Israel Fund is at the forefront. New Israel Fund of Canada is proud to be part of the worldwide NIF family. Join us now, to embody the Jewish values upon which Israel was founded, and to build the Israel you know to be possible.

Alex Grossman z"l leaves an unforgettable legacy

Jurists, philanthropists and a former premier mourn his passing

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

On November 17, Jews in Toronto, Israel and around the world lost a community leader who devoted his life to teaching the lessons of the Holocaust while doing what he could to keep our Jewish community strong.

Grossman - who championed many causes including UJA Federation, State of Israel Bonds, Shaare Zedek Hospital, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Israel's Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust - arrived in Toronto with his wife Genia from Belgium in 1950 at the age of 30. Both Holocaust survivors, the couple had escaped from Krakow to Austria and on to Hungary, before finally reaching Belgium.

Unfortunately, the families of both Alex and Genia died at the hands of the Nazis.

"At first we felt strange in this new country but soon we acclimated and quickly made friends," Grossman wrote in his 2005 entry into The Book of Life – an initiative of UJA Federation's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto which invites community philanthropists to write their life stories. "I remember the generosity of so many individuals who taught me one of my most valuable lessons in life. To appreciate your community, you must give back to it."

Alex Grossman z"l, pictured here at a Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto Book of Life event on Sept. 27, 2005 at Beth Tzedec congregation, passed away on November 17.

And give back to it he did. Grossman was a man who did more than simply talk the talk, backing up his words with tremendous vision, compassion and generosity.

Grossman's personal tragedy with the Holocaust led him to be a founder – with the late Gideon Hausner – of the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust, at Kibbutz Tel Yitzak. Since its inception in 1972, Grossman, who started Belmont Construction with Abe Bleeman and the late Joe Silver after his arrival in Canada – has donated millions of dollars to the institute. Most recently, Grossman's million-dollar gift helped Massuah establish the Grossman School - International Centre for Holocaust Studies.

"I established the Canadian Friends of Massuah because I have always believed that future generations must be taught about the horrific experience of the Holocaust – to ensure it doesn't happen again," he wrote.

"For us, Mr. Grossman was an everlasting pillar of support," said Massuah's director, Aya Ben Naftali. "Massuah's reputation in Israel and abroad is the result of his nearly 40 years of public activity in instilling Holocaust consciousness for posterity at the Massuah campus. Mr. Grossman made the idea of bringing young people from Israel and abroad to an education centre where they could study the Holocaust era, a reality."

The recently retired chief justice of the Supreme Court of Israel, Aharon Barak, was surprised and upset to hear of Grossman's passing.

"I had the distinct privilege of knowing Alex Grossman and of appreciating his philanthropy relating to Holocaust education in general, and to the Massuah Institute specifically," Barak, who appeared in Toronto at a joint UJA Federation – Massuah event, told Jewish Toronto. "His passing is a great loss, not only for his family and the entire Toronto Jewish community, but also for his numerous friends in Israel who recognized his work here, and who greatly valued his tireless efforts. I am honoured to count myself among them."

"I came to know Alex Grossman fairly well over the years," said former Ontario Premier, William Davis. "And, while he was quite successful in the business world, I think, from my standpoint, he will best be remembered for his commitment to family and to his community and his involvement with the State of Israel and other charities in Toronto and in other areas. For those he will always be remembered."

Another prominent world Jewish leader remembers Grossman fondly.

"Alex Grossman had an incredible zest for life and for getting involved and, when he did, he wanted things to be perfect," said Toronto's Kurt Rothschild, chairman of the board, World Mizrachi. "I got him involved in Israel Bonds in the mid-seventies and from there he rose in its ranks. Alex possessed a great and colourful personality, full of energy until sickness struck. He is not a man who will be easily forgotten."

Steve Ain, a senior consultant with UJA Federation and a former CEO of UIA Federations Canada, worked with Grossman for many years.

"What set Alex apart from others was that he simply would not take no for an answer," said Ain. "That's the way great leaders get things done. Alex had such determination and an inner strength that always ensured that he reached his philanthropic goals."

"While small in stature, Alex was a giant of a man when it came to business and, even more importantly, community life," said UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky. "So many of our institutions, services and programmes would not be here today were it not for the vision and tenacity of Alex Grossman. He was a community builder in so many senses of that word. While we all have benefited from his legacy, we are all the less from his passing. I for one will miss him terribly."

"We must never let the spirit of giving die," wrote Grossman. "We must never take freedom for granted. It is our obligation to keep the Jewish community strong and we must all do our part."

And fortunately for all of us, that's exactly the way Alex Grossman lived his extraordinary life.

Torontonians bike for charity in Israel

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

After five grueling days of riding across desert terrain in support of Alyn Hospital, Ruth Ekstein triumphantly entered Eilat on her mountain bike with 424 other riders amidst a cheering crowd. "It was the most exhilarating thing I've ever done," says the long-time UJA Federation volunteer. "We didn't know if we should laugh or cry or yell and I think we did a little of all three."

One of 50 Torontonians who completed this year's Wheels of Love charity ride, in which participants biked from Jerusalem to Eilat to raise money for Israel's only comprehensive pediatric and adolescent rehabilitation centre, Ekstein describes the experience with unbridled enthusiasm. "The scenery was spectacular, the weather was amazing, and there were 425 riders from ten countries so the opportunity to meet a bunch of crazy like-minded people was fantastic. I'd go again in a heartbeat."

Earl Haltrecht, an orthodontist from Toronto and co-chair of UJA Federation's Partners Circle raised US $5,500 on the charity ride. "I love riding, I love Israel, and it's a fabulous cause, so I'd say it was win-win-win."

Alyn Hospital, a world leader in rehabilitation of children with a broad range of physical disabilities, is the only facility of its kind in Israel.

"Any time there are children involved - whether it's a congenital deformity or accident victims or victims of terror, your heart opens up and you'll do anything for them," says Haltrecht.

Although Ekstein has been supporting the Alyn ride for many years, this was the first year that the occupational therapist from Toronto put her feet where her money is.

From October 29 to November 2, she averaged 100 off-road kilometers each day, going "where roads don't go, which was really exceptional," and raising almost US $7,000 for Alyn, which is well on its way to reaching its $2.5 million goal for this year's ride.

Toronto's Ruth Ekstein spent five grueling days riding her mountain bike across Israel's desert terrain in support of Alyn Hospital.

Ekstein first got involved with Wheels of Love five years ago, when her best friend participated in the ride and asked her to help fundraise. At the time, her husband - Alan Lechem - was co-chair of the Israel Action Committee at Beit Rayim Synagogue, and the synagogue took on fundraising for Alyn.

"My husband decided,'why just fundraise when I can also ride,' so in 2004 he went with four members of our synagogue and then last year he went again. But this year I and another woman from our synagogue said,'well if the boys can do it, we can too,'so we went this year and my husband stayed home with the kids."

Prosserman family showers Toronto with generosity

Philanthropist signs agreement for $12 million toward new JCC

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Speaking in front of his family, Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant and UJA Federation leaders at a small, informal gathering recently, Martin Prosserman signed an agreement for $12 million saying: "I thank you all for letting me pay off this debt – a debt I incurred as a child in Montreal, and something I consider myself fortunate to be able to do."

The $12 million represents the lead gift towards the building of the new Prosserman JCC, which will replace the current, 45 year old Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street, just north of Sheppard.

Construction on the new Central Square campus on which the Prosserman JCC will be a key component, is scheduled to begin next fall as part of UJA Federation's $250 million Tomorrow Campaign.

Chaired by Lawrence Tanenbaum and Gerald Schwartz – the Tomorrow Campaign is creating three new campuses for Jewish life throughout the GTA - downtown, in Vaughan and at the Bathurst and Sheppard location.

Prosserman – who grew up poor in Montreal - recalled how if it weren't for the Montreal YMHA where, for a nickel, he would receive a clean towel, a bar of soap, and a hot shower, he might not be here today.

The Prosserman family (l-r) Gary, Ron, Martin and Brian, share a smile after Martin signed an agreement for $12 million towards the construction of the Prosserman JCC, which will replace the current 45-year-old JCC at Bathurst and Sheppard.

"I never really thought this was going to happen; we started talking about this five years ago, but, thanks to Carol Seidman (director of UJA Federation's capital campaign) and UJA Federation President Ted Sokolsky, it's really going to happen, and my family and I are so thrilled," said the elder Prosserman.

Prosserman made his comments in the boardroom of a private investment firm started by the family after selling Moores the Suit People in 1996.

"I saw it in Martin's eyes," said Sokolsky. "He wanted to do something great, something that would make a major difference to this city, a city that has always welcomed wave upon wave of immigrants – just like Martin's own Ukrainian parents. This new facility will serve the needs of young and old alike, for generations to come."

"I remember talking about the concept of Central Campus with Martin and his boys five years ago," said Peter Cohen, chair of the Central Square redevelopment committee. "It's really quite astounding how you can go from needing a JCC in Montreal in order to take a hot shower, to having your name on a brand new, state-of-the-art JCC here in Toronto."

"Every community requires its key leaders to step forward and make a special contribution and truly perform a mitzvah, a mitzvah like the one Martin Prosserman and his family have performed today," said Bryant. "As the husband of a Jewish Montreal ex-patriot, I'm thrilled that you're in Toronto now and that you have given so much. Thanks for being such a wonderful neighbour."

Ron Prosserman, who stood with brothers Gary and Brian during the proceedings, spoke about the significance of the Prosserman JCC.

"It has extra special meaning to our family because it honours the memory of my mother who, like the building, was in a class of her own," he said while fighting back tears. His mother Ellen passed away in 2002.

"My mother was always happy and loved by those who knew her. She treated everyone with dignity, compassion, honesty and respect. The elderly, poor, vulnerable and the general community will all be treated with this same kindness and care in this exciting new JCC."

Also on hand for the historic agreement was Leslie Gales, chair of the Tomorrow Campaign leadership committee.

"Martin told me that he wanted to see this project come to life while he was still here, to make sure it came to fruition," said Gales. "Well, Martin, it's really happening," she said with a smile.

Toronto doctors lend expertise to Israeli hospitals

Physicians volunteer before UJA Federation mission

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

While visiting Israel a year ago, Toronto's Dr. Wilfred Steinberg spent some time at Yoseftal Hospital, a small, somewhat isolated healthcare facility in Eilat which made a distinct impression on him.

The physician was touched by the hospital because despite its size, it came to the rescue of numerous victims of the Taba terror attack in Egypt in 2004, which killed and injured scores of Israelis.

"This small hospital, with only 68 beds, was suddenly called upon to handle a major crisis and I was moved and impressed by how they did it," said Steinberg.

Steinberg kept the hospital's efforts fresh in his mind and recently, he decided to lend a hand to the facility.

Prior to joining his wife, Susan, and more than 40 colleagues and their spouses on UJA Federation's Medical Services Division mission to Israel, the pair decided to spend a few days volunteering at Yoseftal Hospital.

Before the journey, Steinberg, who works at St. Michael's Hospital, asked St. Mike's to provide medical equipment it no longer uses to Yoseftal. "And we found a generous supplier who has volunteered to ship the equipment to Israel," he said.

"In Israel I had the opportunity to work with the hospital to discuss ways in which we could improve everything and anything they do," Steinberg added.

A patient's room at The Nahariya Hospital of the Galilee was devastated by a Hezbollah rocket during this summer's war.

In just a few days, they set in motion a plan to link Yoseftal with Toronto's medical community.

"At St. Mike's, we have teaching and academic-based rounds which will be beamed to Yoseftal via video conferencing," he enthused. "This will erase the hospital's feeling of isolation."

A mentoring program, which would bring young physicians from Yoseftal to Toronto, is another idea being explored.

Meanwhile, Susan Steinberg volunteered her time with the cause that is particularly meaningful to her – the development of human capital.

"I met two young Israelis who are working with troubled kids and I was very inspired by them," she said.

On the mission, chaired by doctors Michael Gordon, Irving Gottesman, Linda Ingber, Howard Price, Rachel Shupak and Jerry Title, the Steinbergs and their colleagues spent most of their time in central and northern Israel, meeting with guest speakers, touring and engaging with fellow medical professionals.

The mission was part of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 which is raising funds to help northern Israel recover from this summer's war with Hezbollah and for urgent local needs. So far, the campaign has raised $72 million with $19.5 million designated for Israel's emergency needs.

A mission highlight was a visit to Nahariya Hospital, which was hit by Hezbollah rockets during the war.

Capital Ideas

Time running out for 2006 gifts

This is the first in a series of regular columns in which Jamie Golombek will discuss how you can get the most out of your money.

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

With only a month to go before year end, December is the ideal time to sit down and review your portfolio for last-minute tax planning opportunities. Ordinarily, this year-end tradition amounts to nothing more than "tax-loss selling": an annual ritual through which investors cull their portfolios of any losing stock or mutual fund positions to ensure that any capital losses can be triggered in time for use in the current tax year.

Jamie Golombek

This year, however, a unique opportunity awaits investors who have significant accrued gains on some of their positions as a result of the tax changes announced in the May 2006 federal budget.

Earlier this year, the government eliminated all capital gains tax payable on a donation of securities, mutual funds or insurance segregated funds to a registered charity. That's right – no tax at all on any and all accumulated gains in your portfolio if you donate the appreciated property to charity. And, you get a tax receipt equal to the fair market value.

But, what if you want to hold on to this winning stock beyond 2006? No problem. Just buy it back, bumping up your adjusted cost base (ACB) or tax cost to fair market value. Let's illustrate with a simple example.

Isaac owns shares that he originally purchased for $2,000 in 1995 that have more than doubled in value to $5,000 by November 30, 2006. He wants to make his annual $5,000 donation to charity this December.

Instead of writing a cheque out of his savings account for $5,000, he donates the appreciated stock "in-kind" to the charity and receives a donation receipt for $5,000. Since Isaac wants to continue to hold the stock for the long term, he uses the $5,000 in his bank account to buy back the stock on the open market.

The net result: a tax receipt for $5,000, no tax on the $3,000 accrued capital gain and an increased ACB on the stock after repurchase of $5,000, ensuring that he only pays tax down the road on any future appreciation above $5,000.

Sounds like a win-win-win to me!

Educators examine leadership issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lucy Cohen

Mark Smiley

Lucy Cohen, head of school of United Synagogue Day School, and Mark Smiley, director of education of Associated Hebrew Schools, were among about 50 participants in a "think tank" earlier this month that focused on recruitment and retention of qualified school leaders.

The two-day event took place at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in New York and was sponsored by about a dozen organizations, including Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) and RAVSAK: The Jewish Community Day School Network.

"Many schools are looking for leadership, and there are not enough people out there with sufficient qualifications and experience to fill these roles," said Cohen, who will retire at the end of this school year.

To some extent, the day school system has too many jobs for too few qualified applicants, because it's the victim of its own success, Rabbi Joshua Elkin, executive director of PEJE and a think tank planning committee member, told JTA before the conference.

There are roughly 800 North American day schools, including 60 that have opened since PEJE started in 1997, Elkin said.

Although Cohen has been in her current position for 10 years – not an atypical situation in Toronto – she said there is an "extremely high" turnover rate among school administrators in the United States.

Some schools have addressed the situation by using interim leadership or leadership teams, she said. Others have hired qualified non-Jews or "CEOs" who are not educators.

"All the movements have to work together," she said. "It's too serious a situation for each organization to do it alone."

Smiley, who was not reachable by phone, wrote in an educators' listserv that for him, the "most poignant remarks were made by people who were honest of why they are not rushing to headship." Among the reasons he cited were dual careers and an "abundance of excellent second-tier alternatives" in larger communities.

He also wrote of "a bright spot on the horizon": a willingness of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform educators to work together.

Planners are preparing to follow up on the meeting, said Cohen.

Teacher brings playfulness to the classroom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"Who wants to tell Frances what my number 1 rule is?" Heidi Larman Brown demanded of her Grade 1 class on a recent Sunday morning, after introducing a visiting CJN reporter.

"They are our teachers..."

Immediately, a chorus of giggling voices answered, "No smiling!"

The playfulness that Larman Brown brings to her students at the Downtown Jewish Community School mitigates the possibility that they will view her as some "crazy, scary lady," as she put it in a recent interview. At 6-foot-1, Larman Brown's height alone could be intimidating for a small child.

"She's so creative. She's sweet, warm and enthusiastic," said DJCS principal Joan Schoenfeld, who Larman Brown views as her mentor.

When Schoenfeld hired her more than 20 years ago, Larman Brown – a Montreal native who moved here at age 10 – had no teaching experience and little confidence in her ability to do the job, because she was dyslexic and had never been a good student herself.

But Schoenfeld had seen Larman Brown perform for kids in an interactive dramatization of a children's book, found out that she'd spent a year in Israel and knew Hebrew, and thought she had a "natural talent for being a teacher.

"She absolutely delighted and enthralled [the children]," Schoenfeld told The CJN. "I saw that she really cared about the kids and that she really cared about what she was doing."

A lesson from the teacher: "I try to enjoy life. When I get to school most days, I plan on having a good day. It works, generally."

Larman Brown, now 45 and the mother of a three-year-old son, recalls that Schoenfeld used to observe her in class and make suggestions. She also encouraged her to attend teacher training seminars.

But it wasn't until Larman Brown was 33 that she set out to pursue a university education.

"I was really eking away at my BA, taking a course here and a course there," she recalls. She graduated from York University with a bachelor of arts in history in 1997, having earned a diploma in education from Queen's University two years earlier. Once she received her BA, the diploma was upgraded to a bachelor of education.

Since then, she has taught commercial food preparation, family studies and English as a second language in the public school system, and home economics at Associated Hebrew Schools on a one-year contract in the mid-1990s.

As well, Larman Brown taught life skills at George Brown College, where she earned a diploma as a community worker in 1985. She also has an interprovincial certificate of qualification as a cook.

From 1988 to 1994, she managed a café/catering business that provided on-the-job training to recovering psychiatric patients, and authored a cookbook of the café's recipes. She was also a kosher caterer for a brief stint at the Lower East Side Café at the University of Toronto's former Hillel House in the 1980s.

At the DJCS, housed in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Larman Brown says her main goal is to "try and convey a love of Judaism."

With her background in food preparation, she often brings edibles to class to complement a lesson, or involves students in preparing foods like challah or hamantaschen.

Her husband, David Brown, is a former consultant in the meat industry. "Between us, we eat very well," she said.

Larman Brown, who serves as the "story lady" at the Beach Hebrew Institute (also known as the Beach Synagogue) during children's services on High Holy Days, said she hated Hebrew school when she was a student. However, her frustration didn't affect the love for Judaism and Israel that was imbued in her by her parents, Elliott, a retired social worker who worked at Jewish Family and Child Service for many years, and Shirley, a jewelry designer.

Heidi Larman Brown instructs her students on decorating challah plates.
[Frances Kraft photo]

"I have the best job, period, in Jewish education," said Larman Brown. "[Grade 1 students] have a little bit of knowledge to build on. They're not bored with the process, and they're ready to have fun. It's great."

DJCS students take on kidnapped soldiers project

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Grade 5 students at the Downtown Jewish Community School are hard at work writing letters to raise awareness about Israel's kidnapped soldiers, urge officials to take action, and to express their sympathy to the families of Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev.

On Dec. 10, Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, will visit the class and collect their letters to the families.

The students are also sending letters to the International Committee of the Red Cross to ask them to ascertain whether the soldiers are alive, visit them and arrange for their release; and to Canada's foreign minister Peter MacKay, to request that the government put pressure on Lebanon and Syria to learn if the soldiers are alive, and arrange for visits and their release.

Yehudit (Judy) Shier Weisberg, the children's teacher, told her students about the soldiers in October, with the idea of doing something to help.

"We want to be role models to get others to do something, because the Israeli government has a lot of political considerations that the Jewish community doesn't have to abide by," Shier Weisberg told The CJN.

The fate of the three soldiers, who were abducted this past summer, is unknown. "It's so cruel to the families," she said.

Now that the students have had their consciousness raised, they are doing their best to take an active role.

Alan Healey-Greene, who two years ago asked his friends for donations to the United Way in lieu of gifts for his eighth birthday, believes that in general, "kids like helping people.

Leah Berson-Wainberg, left, and Alyssa Kahane, work on a letter to the family of kidnapped Israeli soldier Eldad Regev.

"Unless they're bullies," added his classmate Reuben Labovitz, who wrote a letter to Shalit's family with Alan. "We all remember your son," they wrote.

The letter-writing project is the first social action project the class has undertaken, said Shier Weisberg. Although she didn't plan it that way, it ties in with the focus on the Jewish month of Cheshvan as a month of social action, as the students read in the November issue of the Jewish children's magazine BabagaNews.

Student Sophie Mason said that she didn't know a lot about the missing soldiers at first. Kids are into "cartoons and stuff," she said. She hopes the letters to the soldiers' families "will make them feel better."

Also, she said, the students were writing to the Red Cross "because they should go try and find them."

In the letter Sophie wrote with Talia Speigel to Shalit's family, the girls said they have not forgotten Shalit and would continue not to. The letter ends with a postscript, in tidy upper case printed letters, "GOOD LUCK."

Some children tried to put themselves in the families' position. Talia told The CJN she has a sister who's the same age as one of the soldiers. It would be "pretty awful" if her sister were kidnapped, she said.

"If I was one of his younger brothers I would be very sad and concerned," Bronte Morris-Poolman wrote to the Goldwasser family. "We hope he can be found."

Brittany Weinberg Hadley wrote that she knows how hard it is to lose a family member, having lost her grandmother over the summer.

In a letter to the school's parents and students in a recent school newsletter, Alyssa Kahane and Leah Berson-Weinberg – who indicated she had a vague awareness of the issue beforehand – said they hoped others would join them in the project.

"We want to show the people of Toronto and the Jewish community that we're role models, and to show the Red Cross and Peter MacKay that they should do something," said Alyssa.

Reuben Labovitz, left, and Alan Healey-Greene teamed up for their class letter-writing project.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Human-shield tactic works again in Gaza" (Globe and Mail, Nov. 20) Sonia Verma reported that Hamas and other "militants" used Palestinian civilians, including women and children, as "human shields" to protect their property against Israeli strikes.

In fact, these retaliatory strikes were preceded by calls from the Israeli military warning the owners to vacate their homes. Verma wrote that such warnings have been "a standard procedure for the Israeli air force in recent months in order to avoid civilian casualties."

Although the Globe and Mail story arguably gave short shrift to the rockets launched from Gaza against Israel, Verma did quote Israeli spokesperson Noa Meir: "Not only are [the Palestinians] using their civilians as human shields, they continue to endanger the lives of our civilians with their rocket attacks. It presents us with a very difficult dilemma, because we want to do everything possible to keep civilians out of harm's way, but we need to protect our people by ending rocket fire."

A National Post editorial, "The root of Palestinian misery" (Nov. 20), argued that while the use of human shields worked to protect the militants' homes, "the tactic may have backfired from a propaganda perspective: It served to demonstrate that Israel does not seek to kill Palestinian civilians wholesale, as Arab propagandists constantly claim. Indeed, it is clear the Palestinians themselves do not believe their own propaganda about Israel's alleged thirst for blood. Otherwise, they never would have been able to recruit all those human shields."

In "Both attacked and condemned" (Ha'aretz, Nov. 21), Yoel Marcus explored the dilemma facing Israelis. While residents of Sderot live under constant fire from Qassam rockets, the international community ignores their plight. But when "19 Palestinians were killed by mistake, a huge majority at the United Nations sees Israel as the cruel aggressor. Its apology was not accepted."

Marcus wrote: "Israel is the only country in the world in which one of its cities is a target for rockets every day… No country would put up with the situation in which one of its cities is a permanent shooting range, and where crossing a street or going to the grocery store has become death poker."

On CBC Newsworld Nov. 21, Ian Kalushner reported throughout the morning on the visit of United Nation Human Rights Commissioner Louise Arbour to Sderot, filling in some of the details that many Israelis believe have been ignored by the international media.

Kalushner noted that Arbour was able to get a sense of what Sderot residents experience under constant threat of rocket fire – indeed, during her visit, a rocket landed in a nearby factory, mortally injuring a worker. Kalushner's report included the Israeli statistic that more than 1,000 Qassams have been fired this year, including about 150 during November alone – leaving residents angry and frustrated that the UN has done nothing to prevent these attacks.

* * *

On the Nov. 16 edition of the The Agenda on TVO, host Steve Paikin interviewed Israeli author Yossi Klein Halevi, who discussed how Hamas' rejection of Israel and Iran's repeated threats against the Jewish state were destabilizing the Middle East.

Paikin then featured a panel discussion in which all three participants – Tarek Fatah, Hisham Mehlem and Eric Margolis – blamed Israel for refusing to negotiate with the Palestinians. It was as if the "Oslo" years of painstaking negotiations leading up to the failed Camp David/Taba talks of 2000-2001 had never taken place.

But truly stunning was Margolis' insistence that once Israel "recognizes 3.5 million Palestinians" and "allows some to come back to Israel" Hamas, in turn, will recognize Israel. This is utter rubbish. Margolis' claim bears no relation to reality. Hamas has consistently said it will never recognize Israel under any circumstances and that Israel must be destroyed.

Margolis, acting as an apologist for the Iranian regime, also chastised Israel for "beating the war drums against Iran." He bitterly opposed the idea of an Israeli pre-emptive strike against Iran by drawing an analogy to Pakistan: "Why can't [nuclear-armed] Pakistan attack Israel tomorrow because Israel is threatening a nuclear [sic] strike against Iran?"

To which Paikin interjected: "You haven't got the prime minister of Israel giving speeches every day saying Pakistan should be wiped off the face of the map."

Concordia gives anti-Israel British MP a forum

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Jewish students were not pleased that they were forced to move a planned activity at Concordia University's main Hall Building because of a speech by left-wing British MP George Galloway, an outspoken critic of Israel, but they say the university administration handled what could have been a contentious issue with understanding and tact.

Both events were scheduled for the same time on Friday night, Nov. 17.

Hillel ended up holding an interfaith Shabbat dinner with two guest speakers from One Voice, an Israeli-Palestinian dialogue effort, at a nearby downtown hotel, with the university assuming the costs, while Galloway's lecture went ahead in the Hall building's ground-floor auditorium, H-110.

Organized by the Syrian Students Association and the AnNahda Arab-Palestinian Association, Galloway's lecture drew more than 1,000 people.

The Hillel dinner was to have taken place in the 7th-floor cafeteria, with a lecture following on the 9th floor.

"I think it's a shame that the rhetoric of hate superseded dialogue," said Concordia student Ryan Schwartz, co-president of Hillel and an organizer of the dinner. He questions how serious the risk was when the events were to have been seven storeys apart.

Hillel was informed by Concordia vice-president Michael di Grappa on the Thursday night that, for security reasons, the Hillel event could not be held in the Hall building.

University spokesperson Chris Mota told The CJN that the decision to move the Hillel event was made on the recommendation of Montreal police.

She said Samuel Bronfman House, the Visual Arts building and possibly a third on-campus venue were offered to Hillel as an alternative, but it refused them. She noted that Hillel had written to the administration earlier that it was, in her words, "not pleased" that Galloway had been allowed to speak on campus.

The Galloway event had been booked two or three weeks in advance, before the Hillel event was.

In an apparent goodwill gesture, Concordia president Claude Lajeunesse and di Grappa both attended the Hillel event, which drew about 130 students, Jews, Muslims and Christians among them. Although Hillel would have preferred that Galloway had not been given a forum at Concordia, it did not explicitly ask for it to be cancelled and the interfaith event was not held as a counter-event, Schwartz indicated.

He said that there was no choice but to hold it that night, because it fit the two guest speakers' schedule.

Schwartz suggested the Galloway event might have been kept to an audience of no more than 200 and held elsewhere. "Don't give him such a big pulpit."

A Hillel staff member, who asked not to be identified, said the university administration handled the situation as best it could, and Hillel remains on excellent terms with it. The incident should not be seen as discrimination against Jewish students, he insisted.

The bigger issue, he believes, is how to handle controversial speakers in the future. Organizers and the administration will have to consider whether it is justified to "shut half the university," inconveniencing many other people and not enhancing Concordia's image.

The Hillel event was too big to be accommodated at Hillel House on Stanley Street, and in any event, Hillel wanted to hold it at Concordia, where Hillel has been involved in a number of initiatives that promote dialogue this year.

The Hillel event participants were not the only ones affected by Galloway's appearance. There was a heavy police presence outside the Hall building, and the main entrance was barred to all except ticket-holders for the event.

Galloway's appearance at Concordia was protested by Sam Lebens, a national executive member of the National Union of Students of the United Kingdom. In a letter to the student newspapers the Concordian and the Link, he wrote that Galloway publicly praised Hezbollah and its leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah at a rally in London on July 22 during the Israeli-Hezbollah conflict.

"It is my belief that Mr. Galloway is a dangerous figure who seeks to emphasize division rather than to build bridges and who comes very close to glorifying terrorism and inciting violence were it not for his intelligent and eloquent use of language used to shield him from the law."

Anti-Semitism on campus focus of CIJA campaign

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Countering anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist views on Canadian campuses is one of the main priorities of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy for the next year, says its executive vice-president.

Speaking to Canadian delegates at the United Jewish Communities (UJC) General Assembly in Los Angeles earlier this month, Susan Davis said she hopes that the efforts of the National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), an arm of CIJA and an organization of Jewish students who work together with local Hillels and other campus groups, will help counter anti-Israel activities on campus fuelled by the Israel-Hezbollah war last summer.

"It is an interesting, troubling, but challenging agenda that is happening on campus now because what is happening is not these eruptions that happened at Concordia," Davis said, referring to the violent protest that broke out in 2002 when former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was scheduled to speak at Concordia University in Montreal.

"It is a slow and steady co-ordination of groups with planning and sophistication, a long-term approach to winning. [About] 80 per cent of the Canadian student body doesn't agree with either side."

She said that during the past summer, CIJA organized focus groups comprised of non-Jewish students to try to understand where they stood on the Middle Eastern conflict.

"The basic understanding was that they don't agree with either side and they don't want to be put into a situation of having to decide who is good or bad, who is right or wrong. They want us to have peace. And they want the campus to be a safe place," Davis said.

She said that Jewish students involved with NJCL developed a website called RoadtoPeace.org that aims to introduce people to the complexity of peace in the Middle East and create a forum for dialogue.

Davis added that students at the University of Toronto and York University have been working with non-Jewish groups to get them to buy into the Road to Peace initiative.

"I have to say that when we do act through non-Jewish voices we are at our best and our most effective in terms of leverage," Davis said.

During the presentation, Davis also referred to a job posting in the Globe and Mail for a Middle Eastern international relations officer at the University of Alberta, who would maintain contacts "to further the strategic objectives of the University of Alberta in the Middle East region," and would have to be fluent in Arabic.

"Where we do we fit in this? Where on campus do we find influence, not to overcome this, but just to be heard along with this, to balance this kind of thing?" Davis asked, adding that it is important for that students to be exposed to both a positive Jewish presence, and moderate Muslim voices.

"Twenty years from now, the University of Alberta is going to be a very different campus, both in terms of the programs and the people who attend those programs."

Other objectives CIJA has planned for its fourth year of operation, include mobilizing strategic alliances with interfaith and ethnic groups on campus and throughout the community, reaching out to the younger demographic to teach them about Jewish contributions to Canadian society, and ensuring that Israel does not become a wedge issue in the Liberal leadership contest.

She said that although CIJA is a young organization that continues to be a work in progress, she emphasized to students in particular that it is not going to become "institutional."

"Students should know that if something is not working, we will work with them to change it."

Jewish studies program to arrive at Western

By LISA VARANO
Special to The CJN

For the first time ever, University of Western Ontario is planning to offer a minor in Jewish studies.

The course will be headed by Holocaust historian Martin Gilbert who is coming to campus this winter. His arrival is expected to spur the eventual creation of a full-fledged program.

This program will complement Western's "vibrant and multifaceted" Jewish community, said Naomi Mazer, executive-director of London Jewish Campus Services.

Mazer estimates that there are about 3,000 Jewish students at Western, representing about 10 per cent of the student body.

"It's a natural fit," she said of a Jewish studies program. "It's amazing that it hasn't happened yet."

Western is a popular choice among Jewish students from Toronto because it is close to their home, has a sizeable Jewish community on campus, and is a school where students get involved in university life, said Mazer, adding that students are excited about the new plans.

Martin Gilbert

"A lot of them have commented that they're sorry they're graduating shortly and they won't be able to participate in the program themselves," she said.

Tali Bogler, president of Western Hillel, said the creation of a Jewish studies program is an important step for the university in general.

"For Jews and non-Jews it's really going to positively impact everyone and just create more awareness," she said.

Western has been keen on introducing programs such as Jewish studies in the last few years, said Brian Timney, dean of social science.

"The idea for a Jewish studies program was a response to interest from the university community.

"I see [it] in exactly the same way as I see any other interdisciplinary program," he said. "The only thing that is different is that because it's affiliated with a religious as well as ethnic group, then it leaves open the possibility that people will want to debate it more."

The program is being developed within Western's history department and will eventually offer courses in various areas. It will not be a religious studies program about Judaism, said Ben Forster, chair of the history department.

"We're looking at the broad array of Jewish experience," he said. "I think it's incorrect to view the community as being kind of monolithic in character. It doesn't work that way in any cultural group."

Forster said Western already has about 10 Jewish-themed courses.

"Someone who would be interested in learning about the variety of experience that Jewish people have in the world could patch something together, if they wanted, now, but it wouldn't be cohesive," he said. "What we want to do by developing a program is provide a cohesive perspective."

He predicts the program will have broad appeal.

"We'll have to work hard to develop courses to attract a wide variety of students," he said. "There will be a huge array of students interested in these courses – not just people of Jewish background."

Western's program is a latecomer to Jewish studies in Canada, Forster said. "Comparable programs were developed in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

"I think it's developing now because… it takes a long time to get these things to gel in various sorts of ways," he said.

It is coming together, he said, because of support from the department of history, faculty of social science, and fundraising branch of the university.

Grant Stirling, associate vice-principal of development for Western, said more than $200,000 has been raised for the Jewish studies program so far, including a $75,000 donation from the London Jewish Federation and some donations from non-Jews.

"Fundraising in support of academic priorities allows us to fulfil our mission, which is to provide the best student experience among Canada's research-intensive universities," he said.

"I see the development of a proposed Jewish studies program as directly fulfilling that mandate."

An outline of the Jewish studies minor is expected to reach the university senate for approval this spring.

HELPING TERROR VICTIMS: Grade 7 students Orli Bogler, left, and Michelle Zive of Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, school presented a cheque for $12,000 on behalf of the school to Sherri Mandell, founder of the Koby Mandell Foundation. The money will send 12 children to camp next summer and were raised by students and teachers during the 2005-2006 school year through initiatives such as a basketball tournament, T-shirt sales and a talent show.

Campaign helps needy children in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After a visit to Israel just after the Yom Kippur War in 1973, Goldie Burstein, a member of what was then called Pioneer Women, returned home determined to make Chanukah brighter for needy kids in that country.

That was the beginning of Chanukah Dollars for David, a campaign run by what is now called Na'amat Canada, Toronto, that raises money to buy Chanukah presents for Israeli children who might otherwise receive nothing.

Lorraine Levene, executive director of the organization, says Burstein's "heart went out" to children she met at Na'amat's day-care centres. "She didn't want any of these children to go without."

After asking The Canadian Jewish News for help in promoting the project, she says, Burstein and then-editor Ralph Hyman decided to insert envelopes in the paper that readers could use to donate money to the campaign.

Since then, the orange envelopes have been inserted annually – they are in this week's edition – and they're also distributed to Hebrew day and supplementary schools.

In Toronto alone, she says, the drive usually raises close to $30,000, which allows each of the approximately 20,000 kids in Na'amat daycares in Israel to receive a present.

Dollars for David is particularly big at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School, says Levene, where parents are asked to donate to the campaign instead of giving Chanukah gifts to teachers.

Janis Spinner, who has co-chaired Dollars for David in Toronto for a number of years, says it's her "pet project because it is about children helping children.

"Our children have so much, and it's important that they share some of their Chanukah gelt. This campaign gives them an opportunity to do that."

Spinner says she's happy to go out to schools to talk to students about the campaign. "For me, Dollars for David is the best part of winter. I love watching children doing what they can to help out those who are not as lucky."

Alex Grossman had 'a deep sense of responsibilty'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Alexander Grossman, who died Nov. 17 at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre at age 87, was known in the Jewish community as a successful businessman with a passion for philanthropy and a love for Israel.

Grossman, who had been suffering from multiple myeloma, a form of cancer, is survived by his wife, Genia, and his children George and Lili.

Grossman was a Polish Holocaust survivor who escaped from Krakow to Austria, then to Hungary and then to Belgium before he made his final move to Toronto.

In a speech he delivered five years ago at the 100th anniversary of the Jewish National Fund, when he was accepting JNF's tribute to him at its annual Negev Dinner, Grossman said that while he and his wife started making plans to emigrate to Israel, his cousin Sam Waxman, convinced them to come to Toronto instead.

After arriving in Canada in the early 1950s, Grossman began his successful career in land development by teaming up with Abraham Bleeman and the late Joe Silver to form Belmont Construction.

"The three of us formed a partnership and began building apartment buildings as Belmont Construction. Alex was always proud that we were able to contribute to the growth of the city of Toronto," Bleeman said, adding that their relationship extended beyond business, as they had been neighbours for 30 years.

Grossman also became the president of Grossman Holdings, chairman of Pinedale Properties and the director of Egis Holdings and Primegg.

As devoted as Grossman was to his business projects, he couldn't turn his back on his other passions – giving back to the Jewish community and supporting Israel.

"Alex was a man with a deep sense of responsibility to his family, people, community and to Israel," Bleeman said.

From 1975 until the early 1990s, Grossman was the national chairman of the board of State of Israel Bonds, an organization that sells securities issued by the Israeli government.

"I visited every major bank in Canada to ensure their support for a Canadian dollar Israel Bond. It was not very easy or very fast, but it was accomplished. Since then Canada, on a per capita basis, has become the top country in the world in bonds sales, and still is today," Grossman said in his 2001 JNF speech.

A eulogy that was written for Grossman by members of the State of Israel Bonds organization in Toronto and given to his family recalled the way he jumped head first into revitalizing the organization.

"He was learning everything he could, soaking it all up like a Zionistic sponge. And as anyone who knew him will tell you, Alex was a quick study. In fact, Alex became absolutely insatiable in his work on behalf of Israel, and as we all know, his involvement later expanded to countless other Israel and community-based causes."

Grossman was also the chairman of the board of Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, vice-president of the executive committee of the Jewish Community Centre, on the board of governors of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and chairman of Canadian Friends of Massuah.

In one of his last and most significant acts of philanthropy, Grossman donated millions of dollars to Massuah, an organization that teaches students and teachers how to commemorate the Holocaust.

The donation was instrumental in establishing the Grossman School International Center for Holocaust Studies in Tel Yitzhak, Israel.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich of Beth Sholom Synagogue, who presided over the funeral service for Grossman at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel in Toronto, which was attended by about 1,000 people, said that whether or not you knew Grossman directly, it was obvious that he was a "true community person."

"The list of organizations that he was either instrumental in founding or was an instrumental part of vitalizing them, was just outstanding," Rabbi Flanzraich said.

But, he added, although his track record as a businessman and philanthropist is impressive, he was dedicated to his family.

"The most remarkable thing about Alex Grossman… was what people saw on the outside was just a part of what the people close to him saw," Rabbi Flanzraich said.

He added that there are some people who seem wonderful to the community, but their families never get to enjoy them on that level.

"But with Alex Grossman, it was just the opposite. What people saw on the outside was just a little bit of the goodness that was on the inside, which was what the people closest to him [saw]."

The rabbi said the leadership and the love that he showed his family was truly genuine.

"People are going to miss Alex Grossman because of the remarkable ingenuity and the energy that he brought to the community. We are very fortunate because his children and his grandchildren are uniquely aware of the legacy that their father and grandfather has left them and they are not prepared to shrink from it."

Memorial donations can be made to the Canadian Friends of Massuah care of 970 Lawrence Ave. W., Toronto, Unit 303, or by calling 416-256-2900.

Local politician 'fought to see his ideas go forward'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Irving Paisley, the businessman and former North York politician who died Nov. 12 at age 87, was known for having ideas that were years ahead of his time, says his son Michael.

"He envisioned things – such as fluoride in the water supply, carpool lanes, group homes, and an east-west transit line – that other people hadn't thought of," he said.

As well as being an alderman, controller and deputy mayor of the old municipality of North York in the 1960s and '70s, Paisley – known for always wearing a three-piece suit, white shirt and tie – was founding chair of York Finch General Hospital, a founding member of Temple Sinai, played a role in establishing the Canadian Save-the-Children Fund, and served on the board of the Reena Foundation.

He also founded Paisley Manor Insurance, a brokerage now run by Michael and Michael's brother-in-law Ira Kuchinsky.

His father could be counted on to stand up and be heard, Michael said. "He never wavered, once he committed himself to a cause. He touched [people] deeply with a sense of passion and urgency. He did not merely take on a task. He would become enveloped in it.

"When he decided that North York was underserviced and needed a new hospital, he went ahead and organized a committee to raise funds, and sought doctors. When Queen's Park told him there was no money, it didn't stop him.

"He raised, within 10 years, almost half of the budget needed for the hospital to open. It was an almost overwhelming task," Michael said.

His father always baffled people with what he could get done, he said. "Even in the last days of his Parkinson's dementia, he baffled the doctors. He read the newspaper, knew people's names, and at our break-the-fast dinner this past Yom Kippur, he made a speech for his 87th birthday. He died fighting."

Duceppe says Palestinians suffering since aid cut

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Calling for an end to "terrorism, colonization and occupation," Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe urged Canada to convene an international conference to find a way to ease the plight of Palestinian civilians.

Duceppe claimed the Palestinians are being adversely affected because humanitarian aid is not getting through and because of restrictions on freedom of movement since the election of a Hamas-dominated government.

Duceppe said in an address at Federation CJA's Gelber Conference Centre, organized by the Quebec-Israel Committee and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, that ordinary Palestinians should not have to go through "eight checkpoints" to get to work, or have difficulties going to schools or hospitals.

"We cannot wait until the peace process gets back on track before helping the Palestinians. And we must not let the extremists – be they Israelis or Palestinians – dictate the agenda," he said.

Neighbouring Arab states such as Egypt and Jordan should be doing more to help the Palestinians as well, he said.

Duceppe acknowledged the suffering of Israelis as well, and noted that the Bloc supported Prime Minister Stephen Harper's insistence on Israelis being included as victims of the conflict along with the Lebanese in the declaration of the recent Francophonie summit in Bucharest.

The more than 200 people attending the public event gave Duceppe, who spoke mostly in French, a polite reception, occasionally applauding. No questions were accepted from the floor afterward. Duceppe answered the three previously submitted written questions of a general nature, selected by the organizers.

The billed "evening with Gilles Duceppe" was over in 50 minutes.

Duceppe mentioned at the outset that he hoped the invitation to speak to the community proves wrong Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker's "very harsh" comment that he had caused "irreparable damage" to relations with Israel and the Jewish community. Baker make the comment in a letter after Duceppe's participation in a rally of 15,000 people in Montreal on Aug. 6 against the Israeli-Hezbollah war. Baker felt it was inappropriate for a political leader to be at a "blatantly anti-Israel" event that attracted Hezbollah supporters.

Duceppe said he was there to demand a ceasefire and to denounce what he considered "excessive" force by Israel.

"I also very clearly denounced Hezbollah for its attacks and also for its refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist," he added.

Duceppe favours a negotiated two-state solution, with Israel returning to its pre-1967 borders and Hamas renouncing violence and recognizing Israel and its previous agreements with the Jewish state.

If Hamas refuses these "minimal demands," he said the international community has to ensure that it is "not ordinary Palestinians who pay the price… and that the weight of the occupation is less heavy."

As a sovereignist, Duceppe said he fully understands the "right and will" of both Israelis and Palestinians to have their own states.

He called Israel the "most authentic" democracy in the region and said the lack of democracy among Arab states is hindering the settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He said extremists are using the conflict to incite hate and violence.

"Their primary motivation is not to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and not usually to help the Palestinian people, but on the contrary to stir up conflicts."

Duceppe's tone was generally conciliatory. He said he wants dialogue with the Jewish community and that it has been too long since he addressed the community directly.

He affirmed that Jews are Quebecers and, as "part of the family," should participate fully in public discourse, although he advised that they do so in French, so that the majority understand them.

In listing some great Jewish Quebecers, he included the late writer Mordecai Richler, despite his disagreement with some of his views.

The following day in the House of Commons, Bloc MP Caroline St. Hilaire (Longueuil-Pierre Boucher) reiterated Duceppe's call for an international conference, saying the Palestinians are in "a hopeless situation" without international aid. Canada, as chair of the Middle East Refugee Working Group, is "in a privileged position to propose solutions to the humanitarian crisis in Palestinian territory," she said.

"If the European Union was able to set up a temporary process to get humanitarian aid to Palestine without going through Hamas, what is stopping Canada from using its privileged position to do the same?"

Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay responded that the government is concerned about the plight of the Palestinian people and is "looking for a way to get aid directly" to them.

He said he was working with other foreign ministers, as well as international bodies including the United Nations, to find a solution.

Elsewhere in his speech, Duceppe gave qualified support for federal funding of security for religious institutions that feel they need it, a proposal that has been made by the Liberals.

"But this measure must be temporary… the real solution is to eradicate hate, and often fear of the other is at its root."

He is disturbed that any community lives in fear, and regrets the level of security that has had to be installed at Jewish schools and the sense among those of Arab or Muslim origin that they are being singled out.

He said nothing justifies attacks motivated by hate, including that caused by the unresolved Middle East conflict, and deplored that "foreign conflicts are being imported here."

Duceppe has presented a bill to extend the section of the Criminal Code that allows for extra penalties for hate-motivated attacks on cemeteries and religious institutions to include schools, day-care centres, colleges and community or sports facilities clearly identified with a particular group, a suggestion that was applauded by Canadian Jewish Congress.

Quebec has the lowest incidence of violence against minorities in North America, he said, and Quebecers are increasingly accepting of those who are different.

"But we must always be vigilant, showing openness to dialogue and patiently and serenely explaining that differences are an enrichment," he said.

Former Toronto mayor praises Paisley

Former Toronto mayor and longtime North York mayor Mel Lastman, called Paisley a gentleman who cared deeply about his community, about North York and about Toronto.

"I've never met anyone else as devoted. I'm going to miss him deeply," Lastman said.

Toronto city councillor Mike Feldman, who was chair of the planning board when Paisley was on North York council, said he was always impressed with the vision Paisley had for the development of the municipality.

"They were not just visions, though. He fought to see his ideas go forward. He attended the first dinner to raise funds for the Reena Foundation, and he helped establish the organization's first group home."

Paisley was "articulate and bullheaded, and took ideas to the 'nth' degree. We didn't always agree with him, but we certainly respected his opinions," Feldman said.

Ira Kuchinsky said that the word "excess" can describe his father-in-law.

"He loved [his wife] too much; he loved his children too much; when in politics, he worked for his constituents too hard; and when in the insurance business he fought for his clients too hard," Kuchinsky said.

"He did not know how to do things in half measures or in moderation. He lived his life with a zeal and enthusiasm that was unparalleled in anyone else that I have ever met."

In addition to Michael and Ira, Paisley leaves his wife Adele, daughter and son-in-law Susan and Elliot Schwartz, daughter Paula Kuchinsky, daughter-in-law Diane Paisley, and son and daughter-in-law Stephen and Hiroko, as well as 10 grandchildren.

Israel, Manitoba partner on agricultural deal

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, Cobie Brosh was here this month to meet with several Manitoba ministers to promote co-operation between the province and the State of Israel.

Last June, Premier Gary Doer's government signed a letter of understanding with the Jewish National Fund (JNF) to promote research, innovation and development in agriculture and water management.

"Israel is the only country in the world where the desert is shrinking, not expanding," Brosh says, adding that he believes Israelis have much to offer the people of Manitoba in sharing their agricultural expertise.

During his recent visit, Brosh met with Manitoba Deputy Premier and Minister of Agricultural Affairs Roseanne Wowchuk, as well as with Minister of Aboriginal and Northern Affairs Oscar Lathlin.

Wowchuk had just returned from accompanying a group of Jewish Federation community leaders on a one-week mission to Israel, where she met with her counterparts to discuss co-operation on such issues as water irrigation projects and agricultural techniques.

Brosh says the government of Manitoba is "very interested in Israel sharing its experience with greenhouses," which have been built all over the Jewish state, including in the Negev.

Israel's rapid growth greenhouse technology is of particular interest to Manitoba's isolated, northern Aboriginal communities. Given the high cost of commercial food in remote areas, Aboriginal communities are looking for ways to grow more nutritional food locally. The Israeli greenhouse experience can help them promote traditional harvesting, gardening and food self-sufficiency, Brosh says.

Doer has committed $1 million to the partnership with JNF through the province's Agri-Food Research and Development Initiative, which funds agricultural development provincially. This will enable researchers from Manitoba to travel to Israel to study agricultural, greenhouse and water irrigation techniques.

Another area where Israel's experience is of interest here is in the management of small communities.

"Israel can share the kibbutz and moshav experience to assist small agricultural communities in Manitoba," Brosh says. "Our experience could be relevant to issues of how small farming communities can work together. Additionally, we can share our experience in terms of techniques in growing, including which machines to use, and which equipment. Manitoba would decide what to grow, but we can share our experience on how to grow [crops] in a way that best suits Manitoba's climates and conditions."

Looking at other kinds of co-operation, Brosh met with Manitoba's minister of culture, Eric Robinson, to promote cultural exchanges with Israel and explore the idea of exchanges in the area of sports.

Since the Israeli consulate in Canada is located in Toronto, Brosh explains that "when we have a project in Winnipeg, we need to enlist the help of the Jewish Federation of Manitoba or the Winnipeg office of the Jewish National Fund. Both have been happy to be enlisted."

He also met with Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz, who was recently re-elected for a second term.

"Since Winnipeg's sister city is Be'er Sheva, we would like to organize a visit by the mayor to Be'er Sheva in the coming year," Brosh says.

Katz, who is Jewish, was born in Rehovot, Israel in 1951 and is the son of Holocaust survivors. His family immigrated to Winnipeg when he was four years old.

Winnipeg federation program helps new moms

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The shalom baby baskets program started after a group of moms brainstormed to come up with new programs to welcome moms and encourage them to be a part of the community. Now three years old, the program is thriving, with 63 baskets handed out last year and 36 so far in 2006.

"The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg wanted to make new parents and families, locals and newcomers, get reconnected or connected, to other people in the community," says Stephanie Jacobs-Lockhart, leadership development director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg Young Adult Division (YAD).

YAD volunteers assemble and distribute the FAB (feed and burp) Moms 'n' Babies shalom baby baskets, with volunteers getting together at least twice a year or more often, depending on how many births take place in the community. The most recent meeting of program volunteers was held Oct. 18. Along with assembling the baskets, the volunteers deliver them in person and take the time to visit with the new moms.

"During the visits, the volunteers talk to the new moms about the wide variety of programming and events going on in the community, as well as the many services, organizations and groups at their disposal," Jacobs-Lockhart says.

Rady Jewish Community Campus, Gray Academy and local businesses and professionals donate merchandise for the baskets.

New parents have been invited to FAB Moms 'n' Babies first formal program of the year, on Nov. 12, at Ambrosia Spa. Experts in infant massage and aromatherapy will show parents how to soothe and relax their baby. A herbalist will talk about natural ways to nourish baby and parents themselves. After the program, people will have a chance to reconnect with old friends and make new connections over a little nosh.

"At this program, we will hand out the shalom baby baskets. Part one is making the baskets. Part two is an informative relaxing program, where the baskets are handed out. Part three is ongoing throughout the year – as babies are born, moms will deliver baskets to other new moms in the community," Jacobs-Lockhart say.

The volunteers present at the Oct. 18 meeting, who are also former shalom baby basket recipients, were Bonnie Buchalter, Florencia Katz and Lisa Sinclair, chair of FAB Moms 'n' Babies programming.

Upcoming programs include a Chanukah party (Dec. 3), Kindermusik (Jan 11), and a baby-and-toddler-food organic cooking class (Feb 15).

Crown seeks jail time in Web hate case

MONTREAL — The Crown is asking that a Montreal white-supremacist skinhead who pleaded guilty to wilfully promoting hatred on a website he created and managed be sentenced to one year in prison, followed by three years of probation.

In his recommendation earlier this month to Judge Martin Vauclair, prosecutor Thierry Nadon noted that Jean-Sebastien Presseault's crime was premeditated and violent in tone, and the punishment should be exemplary.

"The sentence has to dissuade others from fomenting hatred," Nadon said.

As further evidence of Presseault's belief, Nadon pointed to the 24 tattoos of racist and extremist groups' symbols, including a swastika and the words "Sieg Heil," that cover Presseault's body.

He suggested that during the probation Presseault not be permitted access to the Internet or to associate with racists.

Presseault, now 30, faced a maximum penalty of two years in jail after admitting his guilt in Quebec Court last June.

Presseault's lawyer Gilles Fontaine recommended a suspended sentence or a sentence served in the community, noting that the site was addressed to people who share the same views.

Fontaine also noted that since his arrest, Presseault has distanced himself from extremist groups and is now married and a father.

This is the first time that the Montreal prosecutor's office has pursued a case under article 319 of Canada's Criminal Code, which deals with hate propaganda.

On the site, Presseault expressed hostility to blacks, as well as admiration for Adolf Hitler and right-wing extremist Timothy McVeigh, who was executed for the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing. The site consisted of some 50 pages of text, cartoons, games and downloadable music. It was found on cjb.net, a free, U.S.-based web hosting site.

Presseault was arrested in December 2003. He was living on welfare at the time.

He had been out on bail until last May, when he was arrested for uttering a death threat against the judge in his hate propaganda case, and he has been detained since then.

A search of Presseault's home uncovered a loaded gun and various items associated with fascism and the extreme right, but did not link him to any particular organization.

Defence lawyer Fontaine argued in June that Canadian courts have no jurisdiction in this case because the site was hosted in the United States. He also contended that the type of expression on the site is tolerated in that country because of its more permissive laws regarding freedom of speech.

The two sides were scheduled to be back in court Nov. 30.

In September, an Alberta judge gave an 18-month prison sentence, followed by three year's probation, to a man convicted of promoting hatred on his website, in what was described as a groundbreaking Internet hate-crime case. Reni Sentana-Ries was convicted by a jury last December of one count of hate propaganda for denying the Holocaust and saying Jews were debauched and created diseases such as AIDS and the Ebola virus.

It was the first criminal conviction for Internet hate speech under the Criminal Code.

Hebrew U teams with U of M on research project

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The Hebrew University in Jerusalem has partnered with the University of Manitoba to conduct a research project dealing with the interplay between economics and ethno-territorial conflicts.

The project will compare the Palestinian territories and Northern Ireland to examine how economic interactions have affected political conflicts.

Amos Nadan, a senior research fellow at the Hebrew University, was in Winnipeg for three weeks recently to meet with Sean Byrne, director of the Arthur V. Mauro Centre for Peace and Justice at the University of Manitoba, and continue working on the project. While in Winnipeg, he met with a group from the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University to share some of his preliminary findings.

Nadan's research will outline the lessons to be learned from Israel's economic interactions with the West Bank and Gaza, whose economy is in many ways dependent on the stronger Israeli economy. Byrne will be analyzing the conflict situation in Northern Ireland.

"We have been finding that the two areas of conflict have more and more in common," Nadan says.

Byrne adds that "although each conflict is unique, there are some issues that cross over," including how to deal with issues of "economic deprivation and poverty levels."

Nadan, who has a doctorate from the London School of Economics, believes that in the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, the most appropriate economic model is one that considers economics as "one of a number of factors that contribute to the conflict, but by no means explain the whole story."

Unfortunately, Nadan says, there have been many examples in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict where economic assistance did not have the effect intended by the investors. One such example is the case of Israeli investment in the Erez industrial area in northern Gaza where some 4,000 Palestinians were employed.

"Because the Jews were the managers and the Palestinians were the labourers, this economic development only increased ethnic and political tensions, even though it created job opportunities for the Palestinians," Nadan says.

From 1967 to 1987, before the first intifadah, the fact that Palestinians worked for Jewish employers "created a high level of employment for Palestinians, but also created tensions because Palestinians earned roughly 40 per cent of what the average Jew earned," Nadan says.

Accordingly, even though the Palestinians were earning more than they would have if they were not employed in Israel, the daily interaction between Palestinians and Jews only served to increase tensions. Nadan says one of the main reasons Palestinians joined the intifadah was that they believed their Jewish employers cheated them unfairly out of wages and treated them unjustly.

Nadan concludes that in the long run, the separation of the Israeli and Palestinian labour markets is desirable. But "in the short run, until alternatives are available, both sides would benefit from a certain level of Palestinian employment in Israel."

As for the relationship between unemployment and terrorism, Nadan says that "the people in the Palestinian sector who run the terrorism business are usually wealthy. However, the fighters are low-income earners. Therefore, money invested in the Palestinian economy must be directed specifically to the poor people. Unemployment encourages more participation in terrorism, as the unemployed have time on their hands and are willing to take risks. Employed Palestinians have less time to be active in terrorism."

Accordingly, he says, to turn down the volume of the conflict, "there must be employment in the Palestinian territories and wages must be high."

In his research, Nadan considers the question of whether it is wise for Israel to invest in the Palestinian economy. He says Israel should not do so, but should leave such investment to the Palestinians or other third parties, although he adds that there are problems with third party investment as well. American investment is seen as too pro-Israeli, while investment by the European Union has sometimes been diverted to projects such as weapons purchases that were not intended by the donors.

"Maybe Canada would be a good choice to be a neutral third party," he says.

Byrne anticipates that his joint research project with Nadan will continue for the next couple of years, and that he and Nadan may co-author a book about their findings.

Muslim-Jewish group hosts Judea Pearl

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Right before he was decapitated by terrorists in Pakistan, Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl looked into a camera and said, "My father is Jewish, my mother is Jewish, I am Jewish."

It could be expected his father would want revenge.

But what is Judea Pearl's idea of revenge? Eradicating the hatred that took his son.

Pearl and Akbar Ahmed, a leading authority on contemporary Islam, believe they are slowly changing the world.

And in their quest to change Hamilton, the Committee for Hamilton Arab, Muslim and Jewish Dialogue called upon the two men to help. More than 800 people came to hear them speak at Hamilton Place on Nov. 12.

Pearl and Ahmed lead the Daniel Pearl Dialogue for Muslim-Jewish Understanding, a positive, respectful dialogue on issues such as foreign policy.

They believe that if two men – a Muslim and a Jew – can sit down together for open dialogue, hope exists for co-existence and non-violence.

Pearl, a computer scientist at UCLA, is president of the Daniel Pearl Foundation and Ahmed, Ibn Khaldun Chair of Islamic Studies at American University, is the author of Islam Under Siege.

Daniel Pearl was kidnapped and murdered by terrorists in Pakistan in early 2002. People around the world, along with his pregnant wife Mariane and family, prayed for his release. As described in his wife's book A Mighty Heart, his mission as a writer was to build bridges between diverse cultures.

The Daniel Pearl Foundation was formed in his memory to further the ideals that inspired his life and work: to promote cross-cultural understanding through journalism, music and communications.

Pearl and Ahmed have travelled together to speak in places such as Toronto, New York City, Ottawa, London, England and at Duke University in North Carolina.

The set-up is simple – two chairs, two microphones, two men talking about misunderstanding and tension.

And in Hamilton, it seems, people were listening.

Since the event, Lorne Finkelstein, a member of the Committee for Hamilton Arab, Muslim and Jewish Dialogue, has received countless e-mails, letters and phone calls from Hamilton residents expressing their gratitude for bringing the event to the city.

After the event, some members of the Muslim community complained that the speakers were pro-Israel and did not discuss enough local issues. After some arguing, this group of men invited Finkelstein to meet and discuss their issues.

"This is what it's all about to me. We are not out to change each other's politics. We are here to ensure, that what happens there we can't control, but we can have civil discourse in Hamilton," he said.

The Committee for Hamilton Arab, Muslim and Jewish Dialogue was formed last September in the wake of controversy over the Hamilton police chief's trip to Israel. When vicious invective between pro-Palestinian and pro-Israel supporters brought a public forum on the trip to an abrupt end, a group of leaders from the Jewish, Arab and Muslim communities decided to meet once a month to discuss issues and plan events to promote understanding.

Members worked for six months to bring Pearl and Ahmed to Hamilton.

Finkelstein said that 70 per cent of donations to cover the men's airfare, transportation costs and fees came from the Christian community.

"This is a reflection of the respect for what we are doing to try to promote peace," Finkelstein said.

The evening also included a performance by a choir of Jewish, Arab and Muslim youth, accompanied by the Hamilton Philharmonic Youth Orchestra, as well as a question-and-answer session.

After watching a video clip last fall of a choir of Jewish and Arab children in Israel singing songs of peace, Finkelstein decided that a similar choir had to be formed in Hamilton.

"There are people here who against any dialogue, but if in Israel, Arabs and Jews can come together to sing songs of peace, why not in Hamilton? How can anyone disagree with this?"

Ahmed hopes his and Pearl's work will help change the world one community at a time.

"Dialogue brings respect, respect brings friendship and with friendship, you can talk about difficult issues."

Dorie Greenspan loves baking! In her latest book Baking: From My Home to Yours (Houghton Mifflin), she shares three decades of her favourite recipes as well as the secrets she learned in the kitchens of the world's greatest chefs. This beautiful book contains 300 recipes and fabulous photos that will make any baker's dreams come true!

You'll find breakfast sweets, cookies, cakes, pies, tarts and delectable desserts, and you won't know what to try first. This amazing recipe selection includes Caramel-Peanut-Topped Brownie Cake, Tribute-to-Katharine-Hepburn Brownies, Blueberry-Sour Cream Ice Cream, Apple Cheddar Scones, Four-Star Chocolate Bread Pudding, Perfect Party Cake, Chocolate Chocolate Cupcakes, Corniest Corn Muffins and Pecan Honey Sticky Buns.

Greenspan also includes hundreds of professional hints and an abundance of stories in this one-of-a-kind cookbook. There is a Dessertmaker's Glossary, with more than 100 entries, from why using one's fingers is often best, to how the bundt pan got its name. It includes a helpful list of ingredients, tools and techniques to educate bakers of all levels.

This cookbook definitely deserves a place on any baker's bookshelf. Treat yourself! Here are two recipes from the book to give you a taste of what you'll find. These cookies certainly grabbed my attention!

GRANOLA GRABBERS

It would be hard to find a more after-schoolish cookie than these chunky, bumpy, both chewy and crunchy cookies packed with little surprises. Greenspan created these with her son in mind, but her husband is their biggest fan. Use granola without dried fruit. The fruit in packaged granola cereals is usually too dry and won't soften up in the batter, so you may end up with cookies that are hard and dry.

3 cups granola without fruit
¾ cup moist, plump raisins (dark or golden)
½ cup salted peanuts
½ cup slivered almonds
½ cup sweetened shredded coconut
⅓ cup wheat germ
1¾ sticks (14 tbsp.) unsalted butter, at room temperature
¾ cup (packed) light brown sugar
¼ cup sugar
1 large egg
¼ tsp. salt
1 cup all-purpose flour

Position racks to divide oven into thirds and preheat oven to 375. Line 2 baking sheets with parchment or silicone mats. Put granola in a large bowl and break up any clumps with your fingers. Add raisins, peanuts, almonds, coconut and wheat germ and mix together.

Working with a stand mixer, preferably fitted with a paddle attachment, or with a hand mixer in a large bowl, beat butter at medium speed until smooth, about 2 minutes. Add sugars and beat for another 3 minutes, or until creamy. Add egg and salt and beat until well blended. Reduce mixer to low and add flour, mixing only until it is incorporated, then steadily add granola and fruit. Stop mixer when most of granola mix is blended into batter and finish the job with a sturdy rubber spatula, making sure to get up any bits of dry ingredients left in bottom of bowl.

Scoop out rounded tablespoonfuls of dough, pack the scoops between your palms and arrange mounds on baking sheets, leaving about 1½ inches between them. Flatten lightly with your fingertips.

Bake for 10 to 12 minutes, rotating sheets from top to bottom and from front to back at the midway point. The cookies should be golden brown but not firm. Allow them to rest on sheets for 1 to 2 minutes before transferring to racks to cool to room temperature. Repeat with remaining dough, cooling baking sheets between batches. Makes about 40 cookies. Store in a covered cookie jar for about 3 days. To keep them longer, wrap them airtight and freeze for up to 2 months.

CHOCOLATE CHUNKERS

You'll never eat just one! These big, gooey, exceedingly chocolaty, chunky cookies are stupendous made with hand-chopped excellent-quality chocolate, but you can make them with store-bought chocolate chips in a pinch.

⅓ cup all-purpose flour
¼ cup unsweetened cocoa powder
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. baking powder
3 tbsp. unsalted butter, cut into 3 pieces
6 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
1 oz. unsweetened chocolate, coarsely chopped
2 large eggs, at room temperature
⅔ cup sugar
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
6 oz. semisweet chocolate, chopped into chunks, or 1 cup store-bought chocolate chips or chunks
6 oz. premium-quality milk or white chocolate, chopped into chunks or 1 cup store-bought chocolate chips or chunks
1½ cups coarsely chopped nuts, preferably salted peanuts or toasted pecans
1 cup moist, plump, raisins (dark or golden) or finely chopped moist, plump dried apricots

Centre a rack in the oven and preheat it to 350. Line 2 baking sheets with parchment or silicone mats.

Sift together flour, cocoa, salt and baking powder. Set a heatproof bowl over a saucepan of simmering water. Add butter, bittersweet chocolate and unsweetened chocolate and heat, stirring occasionally, just until melted – chocolate and butter should be smooth and shiny but not so hot that butter separates. Remove bowl from heat and set on counter to cool.

Working with a stand mixer, preferably fitted with the paddle attachment, or a hand mixer in a large bowl, beat eggs and sugar together on medium-high speed for about 2 minutes, until pale and foamy. Beat in vanilla and scrape down bowl. Reduce mixer speed to low and add melted butter and chocolate, mixing only until incorporated. With a rubber spatula, scrape down bowl, then, on low speed, add dry ingredients. Mix just until dry ingredients disappear into dough, which will be thick, smooth and shiny.

Scrape down bowl and mix in semisweet and milk (or white) chocolate chunks, nuts and raisins. You'll have more crunchies than dough at this point. (Dough can be wrapped in plastic and refrigerated for up to 3 days.)

Drop dough by generously heaping tablespoonfuls onto baking sheets, leaving about an inch of space between mounds of dough. Bake cookies one sheet at a time for 10 to 12 minutes. Tops of cookies will look a little dry but the interior will still be soft. Remove baking sheet and carefully, using a broad metal spatula, lift cookies onto a cooling rack to cool to room temperature.

Repeat with remaining dough, baking only one sheet of cookies at a time and making sure to cool baking sheets between batches. If, when cookies are cooled, chocolate is still gooey and you would like it to be a bit firmer, just pop the cookies into the fridge for about 10 minutes. Makes about 24 cookies. These cookies will keep (not "stay") in a cookie jar or container for about 4 days. They can be wrapped airtight and frozen for up to 2 months. Defrost in their wrapper.

Qassams still land in Sderot

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Despite the Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire declared the previous day, two Qassam rockets fired from the Gaza Strip landed in open territory in the Sderot area on Monday afternoon.

No one was wounded and no damage was reported. Five other rockets landed in Israel on Sunday. A ceasefire went into effect at 6 a.m. Sunday and was followed by the Israel Defence Forces' withdrawal from Gaza. The pullout came after a phone conversation between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in which Abbas said he received agreement from all the Palestinian factions for a ceasefire in return for Israel's withdrawal.

Although the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the military wing of Abbas' Fatah party, claimed responsibility for Monday's rocket attack, many in the Palestinian Authority said the Popular Resistance Committees (PRC) were actually responsible, since one of their group was killed by Israeli forces late Sunday night.

Earlier Monday, a leader of the Islamic Jihad in Jenin, Mahmoud Al Saadi, said his group would carry out suicide bombings deep inside Israel in response to Israeli violations of the ceasefire in the West Bank.

Al Saadi called on his counterparts in Gaza to reject the fledgling truce unless it covered all the Palestinian territories and warned that his group might launch a suicide attack on Israel.

In a related development, Jerusalem didn't respond Saturday to Hamas chief Khaled Meshal's threats that Israel had six months to negotiate a deal on a Palestinian state in Gaza and the West Bank based on pre-1967 borders or "face a third intifadah."

Meshal's comments were the strongest confirmation of a willingness to give Abbas the chance to negotiate with Israel. But it was also the first time he set a deadline with an explicit threat of a new wave of violence.

A ceasefire unworthy of praise

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
Jerusalem Post

Comment

The ceasefire in Gaza seems to be holding for now. The ceasefire between the Palestinians, that is. As to the hostilities between the Palestinians and Israel, the situation is still murky.

Officially, all the main organizations have given their agreement to the deal reached between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, but the salvo of Qassam rockets fired toward Sderot a couple of hours after the ceasefire was supposed to be in force was more than just a childish gesture.

It was the best illustration of the dismal state of affairs Israel has reached on the Gaza border.

The harassed people of Sderot and neighbouring communities might have a few days and nights of peace now, but they will remain in the intolerable position of being hostages to the Qassam gangs. Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Fatah breakaways and a plethora of other splinter groups can break the quiet at will, and it might have nothing to do with retaliation to Israeli military actions.

Like almost every terrorist act carried out from the start of the intifadah in 2000, the Qassam firings have had a double motive. As much as the intention was to kill and maim Israeli citizens, the primitive, unguided explosive tubes were an expression of autonomy, not from Israeli rule, but a finger in the eye of collective wannabe Palestinian governments, both of Fatah and Hamas.

That's why the most visible sign so far of the ceasefire is the deployment of 13,000 Palestinian troops, apparently loyal to Abbas, in a desperate attempt to finally assert authority. But why should these ill-equipped, barely motivated grunts succeed where the Israel Defence Forces failed? Does anyone seriously believe that they will shoot at fellow Palestinians just to stop them from launching more missiles at Sderot?

Nonetheless, the IDF is now out of the Strip and on orders to remain on best behaviour. From a tactical perspective, the battle against the Qassams was successful. Israel eliminated hundreds of Qassam terrorists and managed to limit the operations of the surviving ones so that they were unable to effectively aim their rockets at Israeli targets. A limited number of serious casualties were achieved only by the terrorists blindly firing thousands of rockets. However, the perception, due mainly to panicky politicians, sensationalist media and an ambitious mayor, was one of crisis, anarchy and despair. This public feeling also pushed Olmert to reach an unsatisfactory, incomplete deal with Abbas.

From the outset of the Qassam threat it was clear that there were only two courses of action to achieve close to total elimination of the problem: either reoccupying large swaths of the Strip for a prolonged period by mobile forces with authorization to shoot at every suspicious movement, or to get down to serious comprehensive negotiations with the Palestinian side, including representatives of the Hamas government. Both options, of course, have serious downsides, so the government went for a little bit of both. Limited actions and short-term incursions, coupled with ineffectual talks in the form of occasional phone calls to Abbas.

The inability to choose a clear course of action cost Israel twice in the shape of heavy international criticism after dozens of Palestinian civilians were killed in Beit Hanun, and in being forced to swallow an empty ceasefire deal with absolutely no firm assurances. And to make matters worse, Abbas is just a façade. The deal is really with exiled Hamas leader Khaled Meshal, who still holds the fate of Gilad Shalit in his hands.

The Palestinians have gained the breathing space necessary to replenish the Qassam stockpile and come closer to receiving international recognition of a Hamas-controlled government and a resumption of foreign aid, while Hamas continues building its new Iranian-inspired army in preparation for the next round. In return Israel has gotten nothing, save for a shaky and uncertain respite. Confidence on the home front has been shaken once more, so shortly after the north was forsaken in the summer's war.

Activist urges prayer, pressure to help people of Darfur

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS) is calling for a "weekend of prayer" for the besieged people of Darfur to coincide with International Human Rights Day on Dec. 10.

Congregations across the country are being asked to address the issue of genocide based on their faith's traditions and responses.

CASTS is also urging its supporters to join a letter-writing campaign initiated by the student group, STAND (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur) to make Ottawa lawmakers aware that Canadians support vigorous international leadership to help prevent the slaughter in Darfur.

Norman Epstein, founder of CASTS (www.geocities.com/castsudan/), said Canada must display "forceful diplomacy" and take the initiative in mobilizing an international effort to prevent the murder in Sudan's Darfur region.

Despite a UN Security Council Chapter 7 resolution, which mandates the use of aggressive force, little has been done to stop Arab "janjaweed" militias from killing black Darfurians.

"The janjaweed have stepped up attacks, and the fear is they will finish off the genocide unless the international community decides to act," he said, adding that international inaction is giving the government in Khartoum, which backs the janjaweed, a "green light."

Epstein, who has spent years attempting to convince Canadian politicians to stake out a leadership role on Darfur, recently participated in a discussion on genocide and Darfur at Carleton University in Ottawa. The meeting was sponsored by the newly created Parliamentary Committee on the Prevention of Genocide. MP Irwin Cotler moderated the discussion and suggested that civil society should urge politicians to act on Darfur.

Epstein said that "Canada has a golden opportunity to take leadership, as there is a leadership vacuum."

Epstein said it would take very little military action for outside countries to save lives. Doing as little as enforcing a no-fly zone over refugee camps in Chad, Sudan's neighbour, would prevent Sudanese helicopters from dropping bombs on civilians, he said.

By taking the lead in offering that kind of military force, Canada could persuade others to follow.

"If we don't stop it now, there will be more genocides, the UN will become more irrelevant and the international community will be more impotent," he said.

Cotler, Kenney attend Gemayel funeral

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, part of a two-member Canadian delegation that went to Beirut last week for the funeral of assassinated Lebanese Industry Minister Pierre Amine Gemayel, said he sensed a semblance of "solidarity" among the country's notoriously fractious religious factions in the wake of the killing.

"The grief was palpable," Cotler, an acquaintance of the Gemayel family dating back 31 years, told The CJN in a phone interview from the Lebanese capital.

Cotler was travelling with Tory MP Jason Kenney, parliamentary secretary to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and the two men reportedly supported the creation of an international tribunal to investigate a string of almost 15 attempted and successful political assassinations in the country over the last 1½ years.

Cotler told The CJN that the United Nations has already passed a draft resolution to look into the cases, including the March 2005 assassination of Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, which triggered the so-called "Cedar Revolution" that drove Syria from Lebanon.

Cotler, however, still pointed to Syria as being most likely responsible for the death of Gemayel, 34, who was a critic of Syria and a member of the Maronite Christian Phalange Party.

"It appears to be that," Cotler answered when asked if he felt Syria was behind Gemayel's death.

Kenney and Cotler later met with Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and Cotler quoted Siniora as saying that Canada could play a "leading role" in Lebanon's reform and reconstruction, to be discussed at a special international "donor" conference in Paris next January.

Cotler said he raised the issue of Israeli soldiers Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, who were kidnapped in southern Lebanon last July, an act that triggered Israel's war with the Hezbollah Shiite terrorist group.

According to Cotler, Siniora said he didn't "know anything" about the soldiers' whereabouts or fate. "He said: 'I don't know, I just don't know,' and on that point he sounded genuine," Cotler said.

However, Siniora, Cotler related, also pointed to the resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the return of the disputed Shebaa Farms to Lebanese possession as important elements in allowing the Lebanese government to "assert its sovereignty"

Siniora said if Israel gave back Shebaa Farms, "that issue would be taken away from Syria and Iran," Cotler reported.

He described the atmosphere in the funeral crowd at Beirut's Martyrs Square as electric, with tens of thousands in the streets grieving and angry. Some, Cotler said, called for Lebanese independence. He said he didn't see Hezbollah colours among the throngs.

Inside St. George's Maronite Church for the funeral mass, the Canadian delegation sat close to the Gemayel family and commiserated with them.

The family's grief was "immense," Cotler said. "They have suffered so much."

Cotler was referring to Pierre Amine Gemayel's uncle, Bashir Gemayel, who was assassinated in 1982 only three weeks after being elected president. Cotler was in Lebanon at that time.

He also remembered being in Lebanon during the late 1970s when Pierre Amine Gemayel was just a toddler. Pierre Amine's father, Amine Gemayel, also served as Lebanon's president, while his grandfather, Pierre (the father of Bashir and Amine), was known as one of Lebanon's great power brokers and himself survived several assassination attempts.

Cotler said the Gemayels are a Lebanese political family dynasty like the Kennedys in the United States.

Cotler acknowledged, however, that while the Gemayels are one of Lebanon's most prominent families, the Christian Phalangist movement the family founded, is "a very nationalist Christian rightist movement" that's also divided Lebanese society.

Only two days after Bashir Gemayel's assassination in 1982, for example, Maronite Christian Phalangist militias, in apparent retribution, committed the massacre of Palestinians at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps.

Still, it was Cotler's sense that Pierre Amine Gemayel's assassination served to bring together Jews, Christians and Shiites in solidarity behind the Gemayel family. Several speakers at the funeral denounced Syria in the strongest of terms.

The ramifications of the assassination "can cut in different ways," Cotler said. "It could bring about a reaffirmation of the Cedar Revolution.

"There's some feeling the revolution has been eroding or diminishing and that Syria has been seeking to reinvolve itself and undermine Lebanon's independence."

In that sense, different religions coming together for the funeral "seemed to be a kind of rallying cry," he said.

Before returning to Canada last Friday, the Canadian delegation met a number of Lebanese officials, including Justice Minister Charles Ruzk, Parliamentary Affairs Minister Michel Pharaon, Telecommunications Minister Marwan Hamadeh and Maronite Patriarch Cardinal Nasrallah Sfeir.

Olmert says independent, viable Palestinian state achievable

Olmert said that within this framework and in line with the road map, the Palestinians could establish an independent, viable state with contiguous territory in the West Bank, and have full sovereignty over recognized borders.

He said that within this framework, Israel's borders would be established, and they "would be different from the territory which is now under Israel's control."

Olmert said he understands the importance of the release of Palestinian prisoners to the Palestinians, adding that with the release of Shalit, "Israel would be willing to release many Palestinian prisoners, including those who were sentenced to long prison terms, in order to increase the confidence between us and prove that our hand is outstretched in true peace."

Olmert told the Palestinians he believes many of them are tired of the high price extremism is exacting on their society. "An end to terror and violence could enable us to present you with a long list of steps that can be done between us," he said.

He stressed that if the Palestinians respond, Israel will significantly reduce the roadblocks, increase freedom of movement, open and improve border crossings for goods and merchandise, and release Palestinian tax revenues held in Israel since the Hamas victory in last January's elections.

Olmert also said Saudi Arabia, the Persian Gulf countries, Egypt and Jordan could play an important supporting role in direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. Olmert signalled, for the first time, a formal, positive, Israeli response to parts of the 2002 Saudi initiative that offered peace in exchange for a solution to the Palestinian problem, and said he would invest efforts in furthering relations with Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf nations. He said he was appreciative of their efforts to bring about an end to the violence in the region.

Olmert said the circumstances in the region have created an opportunity for Israel and the Palestinians to take a "courageous step that involves painful compromises," but that this means they need to part from historical dreams in order to "start a new chapter that holds out hope for a good life for all of us."

Liberal Judaism grows in Poland

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — With the installation of Poland's first progressive rabbi since World War II, pluralism is gaining a foothold in the country's Jewish community.

Inquiries have been flowing to Beit Warszawa, the only Reform congregation in Poland, since Rabbi Burt Schuman arrived last month.

"About two months ago, some Jews in Lublin came out of the closet, said they wanted an alternative and approached us," Rabbi Schuman said, referring to the phenomenon in Poland of Jews discovering or embracing their long-dormant Jewish identity. "We met with about 33 people, which is more than the official community there of 11."

A New York native, Rabbi Schuman was most recently at a Reform congregation in Altoona, Pa. Since he arrived in Poland in August, progressive groups have formed in Lublin, Krakow, Gdansk and Jastrzebie Zdroj, a city of 102,000 in southern Poland.

The surge of interest in progressive Judaism shows the difference that the presence of a rabbi can make to those who would like to become involved in Jewish life but aren't drawn to Orthodoxy.

Requests for information, education and help in starting a Jewish congregation are coming from Jews, people with Jewish roots and even non-Jews, according to Magdalena Koralevska, 24, a Beit Warszawa member who converted last year and is helping to co-ordinate the congregation's outreach.

> 'The future is in bright colours'

"The future is in bright colours and it's all been happening in the last three months," she said. "My hands are almost too full because of the interest coming in from everywhere."

Rabbi Schuman says he gets so many phone calls from potential congregations outside Warsaw that he wants to hire a rabbi next year to travel around the country to help the new progressive groups.

Among them is Poland's first group of Jews by choice – or converts – which is led by a Jewish teacher in Jastrzebie Zdroj.

"This is remarkable because it's in an area that I would compare with the American Bible Belt, very conservative and lots of listeners to Radio Maryja," he said, referring to a fringe Catholic broadcaster that has aired anti-Semitic content.

Sometimes it's the generation gap and not the style of observance that has led those with Jewish roots to look outside the existing communal system, where Orthodoxy is the governing principle.

Across Poland, members of Jewish communities tend to be in their 60s and 70s, while many of the people seeking out progressive Judaism are in their 20s, 30s and 40s.

"I was a member of the Lublin community but things there were completely dead. It was all old people and no activities at all," said Adam Kopciowski, 32. Through Beit Warszawa, he "realized that one could have a completely different approach to Judaism."

Beit Warszawa is a cultural organization in Warsaw of about 200 members. Founded in 1999, it's heavily subsidized by Seweryn Ashkenazi, a Polish-born California real estate developer.

The Warsaw Jewish community has about 500 people, and a total of 5,000 to 8,000 people are registered as members of Jewish communities in Poland. But local Jewish leaders say the real number of Jews and those with Jewish roots is 10 to 15 times higher.

There has been an ongoing discussion in Poland and across Europe about how to help these people reconnect with their Jewish identity.

For Rabbi Schuman, it starts with making Judaism appealing in the secular world.

In Warsaw, he has initiated "cheesecake coffee houses" for schmoozing, Jewish-themed movie nights, lectures by acclaimed academics like historian Jonathan Sarna of Brandeis University, and Yiddish musical performances.

There also is an eight-month conversion course that he called "very serious and very demanding."

Rabbi Schuman believes he can particularly connect with those who like Reform Judaism's more inclusive attitude toward patrilineal Jews.

"Of course I encourage them to convert, but first they have to feel welcome," he said. "Why is gene pool more important than intention and practice in so many Jewish communities?"

He said relations with Rabbi Michael Schudrich, a fellow New Yorker who is Poland's Orthodox chief rabbi, are positive.

"The more ways one can be Jewish, the stronger the Jewish community is," Rabbi Schuman said. "We both know we're in the business of making Jews. If one starts in one place and ends up in another, we're still making Jews."

Rabbi Schudrich, for his part, welcomes Rabbi Schuman's presence in Poland. "Anything that contributes to the development of Judaism in Poland is good. I'm sure there are things we can co-operate on," he said.

But Rabbi Schuman said he has run up against opposition from the official Jewish community in Krakow, which he claims forbade him to use the synagogue for a service. Owned by the community, the synagogue hosted a liberal congregation before World War II.

"The question is, do you want to build living Judaism or keep the synagogue as a museum?" he asked. "I assure you that when we're strong enough, we'll come back to the community and address the issue of ownership of that synagogue."

In the meantime, Rabbi Schuman plans to hold monthly services in Krakow at a restaurant.

Piotr Kadlcik, chair of the Union of Religious Jewish Communities in Poland, the country's main Jewish umbrella group, found Rabbi Schuman's claim of opposition from the Jewish community disheartening and put it down to a misunderstanding.

He added that only a tiny percentage of union members are Orthodox.

"There is one requirement to be a member, and that is you must be Jewish according to the Law of Return," he said, referring to an Israeli law that makes citizenship available to anyone with a Jewish grandparent.

"At Beit Warszawa, anyone can be a member because it is a cultural, not a religious organization."

Another sticking point in relations between the union and Beit Warszawa, he said, was whether to recognize as Jewish those who had undergone Reform conversions.

"This is definitely an issue, and in time, we'll have to deal with it," Kadlcik said.

Israel Briefs

Shalit no closer to release

Hamas has raised the price for the release of kidnapped Israeli soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit and is now demanding 1,400 Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails, a senior Hamas official said last week. Earlier reports had suggested Hamas, one of three groups that have been holding Shalit in Gaza since his abduction last June, was prepared to exchange him for only a few hundred Palestinian prisoners. Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon, confirmed that Syria-based Hamas leader Khaled Meshal was in Cairo for "crucial" talks on the possibility of conducting a prisoner exchange with Israel.

Medics to Uganda

For the second straight year, Israeli doctors and health care workers will be heading to Namuwongo, Uganda, next month on the "Helping Hands Medical Fellowship" to volunteer for a community in need. The first delegation will be leaving Dec. 3 and returning Feb. 5 in an effort to build the Ugandans' capacity to sustain a higher level of health.

Sharansky exits

Natan Sharansky has officially quit Israel's parliament. The Soviet refusenik-turned-Likud MK tendered his resignation and received a farewell ceremony in the Knesset last week. He is expected to take up a full-time position at the Shalem Center, a conservative Jerusalem think tank.

Qassam victim dies

A Sderot resident died from injuries sustained in a Palestinian rocket salvo. Yaakov Yaakobov, 43, died in hospital after being critically wounded in an attack on the meat-packing factory where he worked. He was the seventh resident of the southern border town to be killed in rocket attacks from nearby Gaza.

Israel helps UN sappers

Israel's armed forces are training UN peacekeepers in dismantling cluster bombs that Israel left behind in southern Lebanon. The UNIFIL sappers are disposing of thousands of unexploded munitions in ex-Hezbollah strongholds.

Canadians honour Israel's forgotten firefighters

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM – As Hezbollah launched rocket after rocket at Haifa during the month-and-a-half-long war that erupted between Israel and Lebanon on July 12, often the only people on the city's streets were firefighters.

"While all the citizens of the city fled into bomb shelters, we stayed above ground, running from incident to incident, in the midst of the falling rockets," said Hezi Levi, captain of the Haifa Region Fire Department.

He said they had no choice, since the collateral damage from the rockets included active fires, search and rescue operations, and gas leaks – and that even one extra minute could have meant the difference between life and death. "It was the hardest month and a half of our lives."

The constant barrage of rockets meant dealing with the new phenomenon of multiple, simultaneous incidents, which the department was unprepared for. It was understaffed, underequipped, and under the gun.

"Because the Hezbollah launched eight to 10 missiles at a time, and each one hit a different part of the city, we had to send crews to all locations. We had to learn how to manage a new system for operating, and learn fast," said Levi. "The amount of hours that the firefighters had to put in was crazy. We didn't go home."

When they did finally return home, it was to empty houses, since all of them had sent their families to safer locations in the southern reaches of Israel. "It was a double challenge," said Levi. "Here we were, working so hard, our lives constantly in danger, and when we came home, our families weren't there. This added a level of mental strain to the already extreme physical strain the firefighters were under."

Levi said the second Lebanon war marks the first time that firefighters have, en masse, required treatment for post-traumatic stress disorder.

Please see photos on page 55

The firefighters of the northern region gave it their all. Unfortunately, their hardships went virtually unnoticed.

Not, however, by Canadian philanthropists Gerry Schwartz and his wife, Heather Reisman, who in a ceremony in Safed last week, honouring the Israeli firefighters, donated three mini-pumpers (small trucks) to fire stations in Safed, Acco and Nazareth.

"This is a way that Heather and I could act in solidarity with the citizens of Israel and, in particular, Israeli firefighters, who played an essential and heroic role in confronting terror during the war with Hezbollah," said Schwartz.

He was accompanied not only by Reisman but also by a delegation of Canadian officials, including Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services for Ontario; Douglas Crawford, Ontario's deputy fire marshal; and William Stewart, chief of the Toronto Fire Department as well as Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, and Steve Shulman, Ontario regional director and national general counsel for the Canadian Jewish Congress, which helped organize the four-day mifgash between Canadian and Israeli fire officials.

The ceremony attracted the participation of around 100 attendees, among them chief rabbi of Safed, Shmuel Eliyahu; the mayor of Safed, Yishei Maimon; Israel's fire and rescue commissioner, Shimon Romach; and a group of firefighters from stations across Israel's north.

Far from your average donation ceremony, this one involved a live demonstration in which a car, bound for the scrap yard, was set ablaze and extinguished to show the effectiveness of the mini-pumper.

According to Levi, the mini-pumper is the most vital piece of equipment for the Israeli firefighter. Because they are smaller than regular trucks, they can access fires via narrow streets, as well as heavily forested areas, where dense brush makes for narrow passageways. They are the "first respondent trucks," said Levi, the ones that are first dispatched to the scene of a fire, so they play a crucial role in stopping the immediate spread of fire. With the mini-pumpers donated by Schwartz and Reisman, there are only 40 mini-pumpers in all of Israel.

But the meeting was not only about the donation of much-needed equipment; it was just as much about expressing solidarity and establishing a real connection between Israeli fire services professionals and their Canadian counterparts.

"This trip gave a real opportunity for both sets of professionals to focus on the commonalities and differences between fire-fighting systems in Israel and Canada," said Shulman. "After spending four days with them, I can tell you that there is a special language that firefighters speak. There is a real brotherhood among them – a very special connection."

In some cases, the meeting was not the first one. Levi had met some members of the Canadian delegation in August 2004, when he participated in a training course at the Ontario Fire College in Gravenhurst, Ont.

According to Levi, the best fire education he ever received was in Gravenhurst, where he studied high-rise fires. Afterward he wrote a handbook on fighting high-rise fires. It is used by all fire stations in Israel.

High court orders ministry to register gay marriages

JTA and Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice last week ordered the government to recognize five gay couples who got married in Canada.

The court found in favour of petitions filed by the couples, who had married in Canada and wanted to be registered as married by the Interior Ministry in Jerusalem.

As a result, they will face fewer bureaucratic hurdles regarding marital rights such as inheritance and tax breaks.

The ruling won't apply to same-sex unions performed in Israel, which are not recognized by the state.

Religious politicians said they would block any attempt to parlay the High Court's decision into new legislation that would accord gay marriage full state recognition.

One Israeli gay couple married in Canada, which approved gay marriage in 2005, said they intend to apply immediately to be registered as married.

"We are very happy today," said Yosi Ben-Ari, whose married status will appear on his identity card from now on.

"Three years after our marriage in Toronto and two years after filing this petition, we are happy that the outcome was in our favour," he told reporters at a briefing held by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI).

ACRI sponsored the first two of five petitions by gay couples married abroad. The court ordered the Interior Ministry to record all five couples.

A panel of seven High Court justices, headed by retired Supreme Court president Aharon Barak, ruled unanimously that the Interior Ministry must record the couples as married. (Judges have three months after retirement to complete cases they were working on.)

The ruling was in accordance with a 42-year-old judicial principle that states the Interior Ministry clerk must register the status of applicants whether they are citizens or new immigrants as long as the applicant has a public document to prove his claim. In this case, each couple had a marriage certificate issued by the province of Ontario.

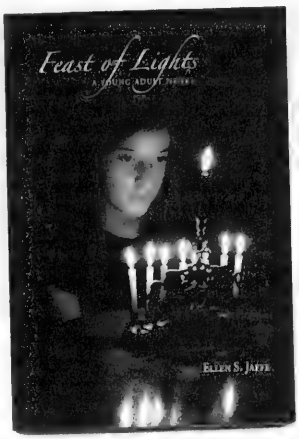
Heartwarming Chanukah books written by Canadians

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor



Two Chanukah books for children by Canadian authors have recently been published.

In The Lubavitchers Are Coming to Second Avenue, the Bernsteins are the only Jews living on Second Avenue in Ottawa. Davika and her three siblings always feel different at Christmas time, but they try to make the best of it.

Their best friends, the Racines, an Anglican family, always invite them to help put up the Christmas tree. And on Christmas Eve, Davika takes homemade cinnamon buns to the Racines.

Up to the age of nine, Davika also believed in Santa Claus, and that he never visited her house because she was Jewish.

Well, one Christmas Eve, the Bernsteins get a visit, but not from some jolly bearded man in red. Instead, they are visited by two Lubavitchers.

They make themselves at home in the Bernsteins' kitchen and regale them with tales about the Baal Shem Tov.

Soon the Racines themselves come over, and before you know it the Besht himself makes an illuminating appearance.

The Lubavitchers Are Coming To Second Avenue, A Hanukkah Story by Sharon Abron Drache, and illustrated by Jayne Lemon (L'Dor Valdor Publications), is a story about festive magic, tolerance, and most of all, sharing traditions, for children ages nine and up.

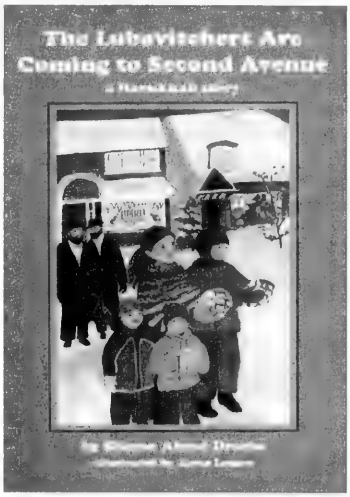
It gives a short history of the Besht and his importance to Jewish culture and shows that though different than Christmas, Chanukah is just as important and festive.

And playing on the Festival of Lights, the book ends with a wonderful display of lights.

***

Feast of Lights by Ellen S. Jaffe (Sumach Press) is another magical Chanukah story, this one for young teen readers.

The holiday is not the same for 12-year-old Sarah Goldman anymore. Since her little brother died, her parents seem distant to her, and have little interest in lighting the menorah with her.



But when Sarah discovers her great grandmother's ancestral chanukiyah, she decides to clean it up and light it each night without her parents.

This is no ordinary chanukiyah.

For eight nights, after she lights the candles, Sarah falls asleep and is transported magically to her past and witnesses events in her family's history.

Her travels take her to a crowded ship transporting immigrants to the new world; to a synagogue in turn-of-the century Europe; to a store in prewar Kensington Market.

Sarah meets her grandparents and other relatives when they were very young and learns about her history, culture and traditions.

Feast of Lights is a heartwarming Chanukah tale that intertwines past and present, joy and mourning, and celebrates the importance of family and heritage.

SickKids to get state-of-the-art movie theatre

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Barry Avrich

For a kid coping with sickness, spending a few hours in a movie theatre could provide some much-needed healing power.

Between the comfortable seats, booming surround sound and giant screen flashing riveting images, the theatre's ambience offers an escape to an imaginary world.

That's why the Hospital for Sick Children is embarking on a unique project called Hollywood at SickKids, which will put a state-of-the-art movie theatre into the heart of the hospital, the first of its kind in North America.

"For a few hours, the child can ultimately forget everything," said project visionary Barry Avrich, a filmmaker who is overseeing the theatre's development.

"It's going to be invaluable medicine for the kids."

The 250-seat theatre, replete with the bells and whistles of mainstream theatres, will show newly released movies, as well as films from a large movie library.

The films will also be broadcast to patient rooms via closed circuit television.

Hollywood at SickKids has partnered with the Sprockets Toronto International Film Festival for Children, to show movies that will air at the festival this coming spring.

A variety of donors are contributing to the project.

"Entertainment plays a vital role in contributing to the health and overall well-being of children," said Mike O'Mahoney, president of SickKids Foundation.

"This theatre will go a long way to help minimize the negative impact of illness and hospitalization for patients and their families."

Avrich, president of Endeavour Marketing, has visited friends and family in hospitals many times and has always lamented the fact there wasn't a place to escape to in the hospital with more pleasant surroundings.

"I was sitting in a hospital room with my friend and I felt like taking us to another place, but there really was nowhere to escape," he reflected.

"So the idea of a movie theatre, where kids can go in, have the lights go down and shut off their world, seemed natural."

Construction of the theatre, which will be built in an existing auditorium, is expected to be completed by April 2007.

Acclaimed designers Joe Brennan and Daniel Greenglass, of JF Brennan Design Build Inc., and design consultant Chris Hansen, are working together on the design.

"They are extraordinary builders and designers who know how to take raw spaces and make them beautiful," Avrich said.

In addition to putting smiles on kids' faces, the technology from the project, such as the 35-millimetre projectors, will be used for educational and telemedicine efforts, putting smiles on health-care professionals' faces, too.

Chrétien adviser pens insider's memoir

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Eddie Goldenberg had a bird's-eye view of government when Jean Chrétien was a cabinet minister and then Canada's prime minister. As Chrétien's adviser, principal secretary and chief of staff, he dealt with a wide variety of domestic and foreign policy issues.

Reflecting on his three-decade career, Goldenberg has written an insider's memoir of life at the top of the heap. The Way It Works: Inside Ottawa (Douglas Gibson Books) will appeal to both the average reader and to political junkies.

The 400 page book is an exposition of the Chrétien years and a primer on Canadian politics. It's worth dipping into, because Goldenberg was at the centre of things and knew how to exercise power.

He helped establish and implement government priorities. He was involved in the preparation of federal budgets and elections. He participated in meetings with provincial premiers. He met world leaders, including the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and U.S. President George W. Bush. He managed Chrétien's often testy relationship with Paul Martin, the finance minister who coveted and subsequently assumed Chrétien's job.

Goldenberg also had a hand in formulating the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and played a role in two Quebec referendums and the passage of the Clarity Act.

Goldenberg also advised Chrétien on what position Canada should adopt in the looming war in Iraq.

So this is clearly a book that can't be ignored.

Despite his partisan ardour as a Liberal,

Eddie Goldenberg with Jean Chrétien

Goldenberg is a seasoned analyst who can size up a complex situation in a few telling words.

Consider this snippet on Iraq: "Canada soon faced a difficult decision. On the one hand, the government did not want to go to war in Iraq without the sanction of the United Nations. On the other hand, it was acutely sensitive to the impact of Sept. 11 on the United States, Canada's closest ally, and hoped it wouldn't have to make a decision that would appear insensitive to the trauma caused by the attacks on the World Trade Center."

Goldenberg's analytical skills are similarly at work in this paragraph on the 1995 Quebec referendum: "Chrétien's dilemma was that he might not be able at the last moment to persuade Quebecers of the real intentions of the Yes forces. He had an awesome responsibility. If he… stated bluntly that a Yes vote would mean the breakup of Canada and then the Yes side won, how could he argue… that the vote was illegitimate because the question was unclear? On the other hand, if he did not make the argument that a Yes vote would mean the breakup of Canada, then the Yes forces had a much better chance of winning."

Bush impressed Goldenberg as a president who spoke his mind. Shortly before the United States attacked the Taliban regime, Bush told Chrétien, "I have to manage the bloodlust of the American people."

Goldenberg, however, was shocked by Bush's poor taste in jokes. At a meeting with Chrétien at the White House about a year later, Bush declared, "If I catch anyone who leaks in my government, I would string them up by the thumbs. The same way we do with prisoners in Guantanamo!"

In his epilogue, Goldenberg sets out his "iron rules of politics" in Canada.

A sampler:

"Prime ministers will continue to be accused of exhibiting dictatorial traits when they set government priorities and make unpopular decisions; and they will continue to be accused of lacking in courage when they don't make such decisions."

The Way It Works is obviously written by a person who is intimately familiar with the corridors of power in Ottawa.

Biblical history may never be the same

Filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici asks the million-dollar question in his compelling documentary, The Exodus Decoded: Can the flight of the Israelites from Egypt be supported by archeological evidence?

Now available on DVD, The Exodus Decoded will be of interest to Jews, Christians and Muslims, since that biblical story lies at the heart of Judaism and is important to both Christianity and Islam.

So is the Exodus fact or fiction?

Archeologists have not yet found irrefutable evidence that it ever even happened. But Jacobovici claims to have solved "the ultimate archeological mystery." His verdict is that the Exodus, far from being a fairy tale, is based on facts.

He makes his case like an old-fashioned investigator, bolstering it with visits to archeological sites in Egypt, interviews with experts and state-of-the-art 3D computer graphics.

To his credit, he acknowledges that none of the experts buy his theory. Nevertheless, biblical history may never be the same again after The Exodus Decoded.

Treading where archeologists have apparently never gone, Jacobovici offers a persuasive scientific explanation of the Exodus.

He begins with the well-documented eruption of a volcano on the Greek island of Santorini around 1500 BCE.

The dust from that explosion – which destroyed the Minoan civilization – drifted some 750 kilometres into Egypt and set in motion a series of events. It brought on darkness, caused the parting of a body of water that enabled Moses and the Israelites to escape the wrath of a pharoah, and afflicted the Egyptians with a plague of flies, frogs and locusts.

Scholars maintain that the date of the Exodus is 1270 BCE, but according to Jacobovici, the actual date is about 1500 BCE.

How does he know?

He examines a stele in the Egyptian Museum in Cairo that refers to a great storm that enveloped Egypt in darkness during that period.

He finds a wall painting in a desert tomb that supposedly records the migration of the Israelites from Egypt.

He reads a wall inscription in a deserted mine in the Sinai Peninsula that refers to Israelite slaves.

He discovers a Minoan painting that appears to confirm the parting of a sea.

Jacobovici convincingly argues that this proverbial event occurred not in the Red Sea but in Lake El Balah, now a salt marsh.

In a similar vein, Jacobovici's explanation of why the waters turned red and why first-born Egyptian boys died rings true.

Digging deeper, he supposedly identifies the pharoah who hounded and chased the Israelites, and claims that Mount Sinai – where Moses received the Ten Commandments – is actually somewhere else in Egypt. Last but not least, Jacobovici says that a certain gold image is none other than the lost Ark of the Covenant.

It all seems fantastical, but Jacobovici seems to be on to something significant, judging by his marshalling of the evidence. Watch The Exodus Decoded and then decide yourself who's right. –S.K.

Montreal singer scores with VJ Search's theme song

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

At 13, she knew she wanted to sing; by 19, she was rocking out: hard core.

Montreal native Lindsay Robins burst onto the Canadian music scene this year as the voice behind MuchMusic's VJ Search theme song, "What Would You Do."

Possessed of a powerful voice and natural swagger, Robins wowed viewers and listeners everywhere with her edgy vocals for the music channel's show.

But she didn't come from nowhere.

Robins, who embodies the "wild girl" image on her rocking 2006 debut album, Dirty Chemistry, comes by her talent honestly.

Her mother was a professional singer on the Montreal wedding circuit, and educated her on the business of singing before she even graduated high school.

At six years old, she was singing with her mother's band at weddings. By 13, she was writing, recording in studios and dreaming of making it big as a music star.

But first she had to find her identity.

Being the "nice Jewish girl" singer was not an option for Robins.

"I never really liked singing bubblegum music, and over time I became sick of being told to make my vocals sound less aggressive," she writes on her blog.

Though secure in her Jewish identity, her comfort level while attending Montreal's Bialik High School was anything but.

Her persona didn't fit in with the more conservative atmosphere at Bialik.

"Let's just say that… [Bialik] was very clique-y and if you're different, which I always was, they didn't like that," Robins said.

She eventually transferred to St. George's High School, realizing she needed space to grow.

"I wasn't going to change," she said. "So I wanted to broaden my horizons and meet new people who I could get along with better."

That didn't mean she forsook her Jewish roots. Quiet the contrary.

"It definitely plays a part in my character. It helps make me who I am," she said. "Obviously, I was raised [Jewish] and that [informs] my sense of family."

Still, her heritage created some challenges for her along the way.

"One time when I was in a club, there was this boy who didn't stop saying, 'Jews can't be singing rock music, there's no place for Jews in rock music.' He didn't stop," Robins said.

Her response?

"I punched him across the face and he never bothered me again," she said.

Though she doesn't condone violence, her feisty spirit doesn't tolerate abuse or failure.

Robins insists she will make it in the business, even though she knows it's a hard road.

"There was nothing I ever wanted to do more than singing," she said. "People tell me, 'Choose a backup plan.' But my backup plan to music, is music. So it better happen."

Her onstage persona may be wild and carefree, but her off-stage one is determined.

Robins is going about her career as professionally and level-headedly as possible.

She is present at all her contract negotiations and insists on being involved in every step of the recording process.

"I made sure when I signed the record deal that I retained as much control as possible," Robins said. "I'm a sponge. I like to know what managers, [and] a CEO of a [record] label does. Because who knows? Maybe when I'm older I'll do more than just sing and write."

For the moment though, Robins is content to keep touring and working on her songwriting.

Though she works in pop-rock, her musical tastes are not confined to that genre.

"I don't think you can be a complete writer unless you listen to all sorts of music," she said. "There's so much to learn about phrasing and instrumentation. You can't pick that all up through pop music."

So what would she do if her rock career ended?

"I'd probably be singing at weddings like my mother," she said with a laugh.

Robins concludes her current Canadian tour on Dec. 2 with a show at Montreal's Club Soda.

She will rest over the holidays and resume touring in 2007. No dates have been set yet.

Musician is the poster boy for positive Israeli PR

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Special to The CJN

Sabras see him as an "ethnic" Israeli musician; African-Americans embrace him as a brother promoting Ethiopian culture and Black History Month; Jews take him as a poster boy for positive Israeli public relations, while the rest of the world defines Idan Raichel, producer, musician and singer, much in the same way he describes himself – as a world-music artist.

We know him best for the mass of dreadlocks tamed by a Middle Eastern turban and the catchy tunes from the 2002 Idan Raichel Project CD – songs strung together with nuggets of enchanting Ethiopian melodies, Yemenite chants, Caribbean rhythms and biblical references.

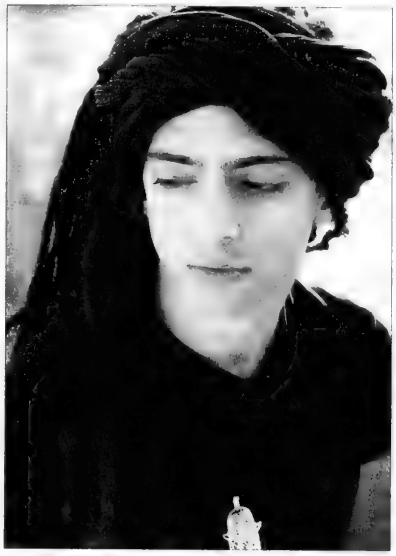
His songs can be heard playing in the dancehalls of Ethiopia, on North American radios and in the car stereos of Orthodox Jewish girls in Israel who listen to decidedly Jewish music.

Raichel, 29, says the use of Torah references in his songs was a natural choice. "There are no better love songs than the Song of Songs, no poems more philosophical than Kohelet [Ecclesiastes], and no story of faith stronger than that of Job."

Spiritual lyrics, partnered with the sounds of traditional Yemeni, Moroccan and Ethiopian melodies, have won Raichel a place in the hearts of Israelis of all ages who can, at the very least, hum the immensely popular hit Im Telech (If You Go). His concerts in Israel are usually sold out.

Outside of Israel, Raichel and a handpicked collection of artists he has plucked from his studio sessions have performed from Singapore to New York City, begging the question – how is it, that a third-generation Ashkenazi Jew from Israel, whose first instrument was the accordion, has rocked the world-music scene?

"It is true that I tried to play on a 'non-cool' instrument," Raichel told The CJN at his Tel Aviv home, on a quiet street across from Meir Park. "But I know it is the roots for what I am doing."



Idan Raichel

Raichel is dressed in a long-sleeved T-shirt and loosely fitted parachute pants, with their strings dangling on the sides. His signature dreadlocks are undone and he sits on a kitchen chair, legs crossed, in his living room. An African drum, a piano and a MacBook Pro laptop are the only instruments in sight. "The recording studio is still in my parents' basement in Kfar Saba," he says.

Raichel comes off as personable and sweet as Israelis say he is. And Canadians were lucky to get a taste of his charm recently when Raichel and seven other musicians performed to a crowd at the Music Hall in Toronto. Canadians, whom he would like to get to know better, are "very open-minded," he says.

The performance in Toronto headlined the event Yachad (Together), a concert organized by the Jewish university student unions to show their solidarity with the people of Israel. Sponsors of the event included Hillel of the Greater Toronto Area, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Israel Program Center, the Consulate General of Israel and the March of the Living. Local artists including the Varsity Jews, Hol Neshama and the Hallelujah Drummers also performed.

"There have been a lot of negative experiences for students on campus since school started in regards to this summer in Israel and Lebanon, and the continued situation within Gaza," Michal Kaye, director of the Israel Program Center, said. "The concert with Raichel," she notes, was "meant to show a different side to Israel."

Raichel is famous for presenting Israel's different sides, including that of the Ethiopian Jewish community. He has appeared at venues such as the B.B. King Night Club, New York's Apollo Theatre, Peter Gabriel's WOMAD festivals and has lectured about black Jews for Black History Month in the United States.

Raichel's songs – in Hebrew, Amharic, Arabic and Hindi – are popular the world over because "people can find themselves or parts of their own culture in the project," he says.

And as a Jew, Raichel is certainly happy to play the poster boy that shows another side to Israel. "I am very happy that there is this side effect [to my music]," says Raichel, "that in addition to performing all over the world, we can help do some PR for Israel to a worldwide audience."

GUESS WHO'S COMING FOR SHABBAT WINS JEWISH PLAYWRITING CONTEST

Phil Pivnick of Toronto is winner of the 2006 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest for his play Guess Who's Coming for Shabbat. It was chosen from 20 entries and four semifinalists, and concerns a family's coming to terms with a son's prospective gay marriage. (The title is an obvious allusion to Guess Who's Coming to Dinner, the famed 1967 Spencer Tracy-Katharine Hepburn film on the social taboo of white-black marriage.)

"This is a provocative play, truthfully but humorously portrayed," said a member of the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto, which co-sponsors the contest with the Nadal JCC. Honourable mention goes to runner-up David Copeland for his play The Rabbi of Ragged Ass Road. The winning play will receive a staged, professionally directed reading in the spring, said Esther Arbeid, theatre and film co-ordinator for the Nadal JCC.

Film Notes

• M – A City Looks for a Killer, the classic 1931 German film by Fritz Lang, focuses on a child murderer who so threatens the serenity of Berlin that even the criminal underworld chase after him. Peter Lorre's portrayal of the killer set the benchmark for his career. The film has been called "one of the defining movies of European pre-World War II cinema" and is considered the predecessor to all serial killer thrillers like Psycho and Silence of the Lambs. The Goethe-Institut presents a rare screening. $5. Thursday, Nov. 30, 8 p.m. www. goethe.de/ins/ca/tor/enindex. htm

• Shlomo Schwartzberg, film critic and former programming director for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, introduces Karin Albou's La Petite Jerusalem, a French film about the complicated lives of two Orthodox Jewish sisters. Set in present-day Paris, the film lovingly showcases the religious rituals and traditions of the sisters while telling their stories, set against the backdrop of a society filled with racial and religious tensions. In French, Arabic and Hebrew, with English subtitles. $8-$4. Bloor Cinema, Dec. 11, 7 p.m.

Personality quirks, rotten luck diminished Adele Wiseman's career

The Force of Vocation: The Literary Career of Adele Wiseman by Ruth Panofsky, University of Manitoba Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Writing careers can be fragile mechanisms – introduce a few uncontrollable ingredients, whether they be personality quirks or simple bad luck, and you have a recipe for self-destruction.

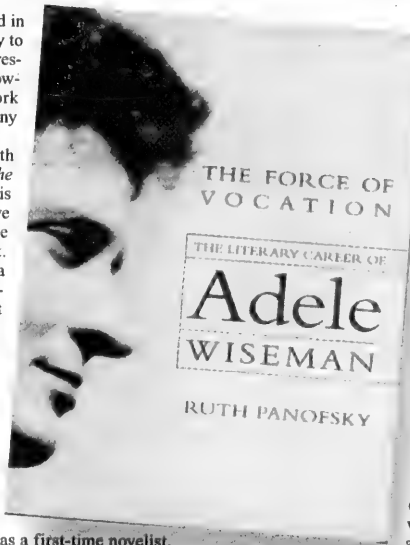
Norman Ravvin

Among the best anecdotes for conveying the importance of good fortune in literary lives is a story concerning the release of Jack Kerouac's On the Road. Because the regular New York Times reviewer, who would have buried the book, was on holiday, it was reviewed by Gilbert Millstein, a sympathetic freelancer who described its publication as a "historic occasion." Call this the Millstein Effect.

At the opposite pole from Kerouac's good luck were the brutally unlucky circumstances that greeted Nathanael West's 1933 novella Miss Lonelyhearts. The reviewers – influential figures among them – loved the book, but its publisher descended into an acrimonious bankruptcy and the stock was locked up in a warehouse as part of the ensuing legal battle. Even West's death was a spectacle of rotten luck: a notoriously inattentive and talkative driver, he flew through a highway stop sign at top speed and was killed by an oncoming vehicle.

Winnipeg-born Adele Wiseman was a victim of the latter pattern – the West Effect – often bringing rotten luck and diminished expectations down upon herself by wilfully odd or wrongheaded decisions. Her first novel, The Sacrifice, won the Governor General's Award in 1956, was published internationally to good reviews, and gained her the prestigious opportunity to take up fellowships at Yaddo in upstate New York and at the MacDowell writer's colony in New Hampshire.

Yet the writer's life, told in Ruth Panofksy's The Force of Vocation: The Literary Career of Adele Wiseman, is notably lacking in circumstances we might recognize as being under the influence of the Millstein Effect. Instead, in turn after turn, we see a writer with a seeming desire to graduate from the Nathanael West School of Hard Knocks.



Panofsky offers a sympathetic and knowledgeable account of Wiseman's life and work, making every effort not to judge, or view ironically the trajectory of her subject's career. She concludes by suggesting that Wiseman, always "the agent at the centre of her career… did not regard her incremental loss of literary recognition as fatal. Her monumental success as a first-time novelist, when she won prestigious awards and honours and reached an international audience, did not impede her vision of the writer as moral witness to her time. In fact, as Wiseman's career unfolded with increasing difficulty, she grew convinced of the integrity of her vision of the writer. The further away she moved form the exhilarating success of The Sacrifice, the more she believed that her work held meaning outside market conditions."

But Wiseman's "increasing difficulty" was not of the kind familiar to most struggling authors. Her completed fiction and non-fiction manuscripts were published by major houses; influential editors supported and enabled her work; she was well and often positively reviewed in the mainstream press; and she had the personal and professional backing of Margaret Laurence, one of Canada's most influential and best loved postwar novelists.

Still, the West Effect was routinely at the wheel. After the success of The Sacrifice, she rejected the advice that she follow it with a novel, and worked for years on a four-hour-long play titled The Lovebound, which was never judged producible by theatre professionals, while publishers were unwilling to bring it out in print. A second novel was not published until 1974, a fatally long time after her initial success, at a moment when readers and critics were not ready for its rollicking, gritty mix of the grotesque and down-and-out old-world characters in Winnipeg's North End.

When the publisher of Wiseman's 1978 memoir, Old Woman at Play, managed, after upward of 60 rejections, to find the book an American publisher, Wiseman rejected the offer from George Braziller as "unsatisfactory." Add to this the difficulty the publisher encountered in educating booksellers about how to categorize and promote Wiseman's portrait of her mother's doll making. It's a sad day for both publisher and author when they find that their expensively produced memoir, penned by one of the country's serious novelists, has been filed in the "crafts" section.

These latter two incidents, described to Panofsky in interviews with Wiseman's publisher at the time, include the right balance of wilful self-destruction, rotten luck and inadvertent black humour required to place Wiseman at the top of the class at West's School of Hard Knocks. What can one say about a writer who says no to George Braziller, whose backlist would soon include such names as Langston Hughes, Albert Einstein and Marc Chagall? Most would agree that such a writer deserves to find her memoir not only in the crafts section, but on a low shelf at the back of the store.

Panofsky does not wish to say as much. She is, rightly, Wiseman's supporter, and this support is justified by a resurgence of interest in Wiseman's two novels, which now seem prescient in their feminism as well as in their portraits of ethnic milieus.

Wiseman's relationship with Margaret Laurence is also of interest to scholars and fans, and Panofsky's previous work includes a thoroughly readable collection of the letters these two writers sent each other over many years.

By giving Wiseman credit for her stoutheartedness, and her wilful tendency to be "the agent at the centre of her career," Panofsky tells the life as it was, and not as it might have been. One can argue that this is a fair-minded and admirable approach, which refuses to second-guess the decisions that directed Wiseman's career.

Still, when we think of West, talking at his companion as he drove straight to his own end, there is pathos and a species of true human nuttiness. One expects that a fair-minded reading of Wiseman's life and work could be made to include some of these things, too.

Teens susceptible to drug abuse, expert says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Fulfilling the obligation of raising our children properly means being aware of all the possible pitfalls, says a family doctor with an interest in addiction medicine.

"We live in a society in which values have deteriorated. There is a lack of discipline and a lack of restraints," said Dr. Michael Kirzner, clinical head of the Ontario Addiction Treatment Centre.

Speaking about teen drug addiction during a recent lecture at the Aish Learning Centre's Thornhill branch, Kirzner said the adolescent brain is still in the process of maturation, which leads many teens to take part in high-risk behaviour.

"This dispels the idea of becoming a true adult at age 13. At that age, they are responsible, but only partially responsible. They still have to mature."

Kirzner said that he has read statistics indicating that about 50 to 60 per cent of adolescents ages 12 and 13 have had sexual relations. "Even if that figure is exaggerated, is 30 per cent any better?"

He said that in his practice, he has seen girls with fallopian tubes scarred from infection, and others who are pregnant at age 15 or 16.

"They're not ready to raise kids, and even if they have an abortion, they pay the price of being emotionally scarred."

Drugs are easily accessible in every school, said Kirzner, and violent crimes have increased. "Some teens have guns, and people are at risk of being shot. In certain aspects, society is moving in a terrible direction."

Behind this behaviour, he said, are kids who are anxious, or have low self-esteem, attention deficit disorder, obsessive compulsive disorder or learning disabilities.

"There are also kids who are spiritually or socially dysfunctional, and others who are modelling their behaviour after others. They see [other kids taking part in certain activities] and it becomes normalized for them."

In the Jewish world, he said, parents are wondering if the problem is because of them, their kids or society.

"The answer is complex, so we have to look at all the factors. Is the parents' marriage working? Are the siblings well? Is there emotional or physical abuse? These things have bearing on the child's behaviour."

To some kids, he said, taking to the street is very tempting. "[It seems to them] like a warm, open place, but once they adopt the street culture, they start to get diseases such as HIV or hepatitis.

"When people end up on the street, they [lose] their values. They do what it takes to survive. A Jew on the streets is a hollowed out Jew, and when our values are poor, we accept the values of the dominant culture."

If parents are concerned about their child's behaviour, have them tested, Kirzner advised. "Don't run from any issues."

Warning signs that kids may be in trouble, he said, include less talking, more time out of the house, and increased hostility.

"Change in normal conversation is a problem. If they stop talking to you, that's a red flag. If they're pushing away from you, that's also a red flag."

Experimenting with drugs may be normal, Kirzner said, but "we don't know which kid will get addicted and which one won't. We have to be wide awake, keep our eyes open and be vigilant. A kid may not come out of the other side of a phase."

Kids become addicted to drugs when they try to fill a hole in their soul, he said. "We have to give kids values that will fill the void. Without values, we are in trouble."

He added: "Honour your kids, because a person who gives honour is honoured. [Show them that you're happy] and at one with events in life. [Also become one] with adversity, because challenges are an opportunity for growth."

Kirzner also advised his listeners to make their homes a safe place for kids. "Love them unconditionally, and build on their strengths and aptitudes."

He concluded: "Raising children is holy and special, and you should pray for your child's safety in the world. You should feel no guilt, because you are not in control of the final outcome, but you can keep working on it."

Woman gets kidney, liver transplants

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

As reported last week in The CJN, Suzi Kind was in desperate need of both a liver and kidney transplant due to complications arising from hepatitis C, which she contracted after gallbladder surgery about 20 years ago.

On Nov. 20, she got a new liver and new kidney.

Her daughter Sarit said in a media release that her mother, 52, had received a pass to leave the hospital to attend an event earlier this month that the family sponsored to raise awareness about the need for organ and tissue transplants. The very next afternoon, she got a call that there might be a liver and a kidney available.

After a 12-hour surgery fraught with many tense moments, the family was informed that it appeared to have been a success and that Suzi was stable.

Sherry Kind, Suzi's other daughter, said that as of last week, two days after the surgery, she was in intensive care at Toronto General Hospital, asleep under deep sedation.

"I think she can hear us – she seems to respond when we talk to her. And she opens her eyes sometimes, although I don't think she can really see us," Sherry said.

She added that when her mother had her first liver transplant in 1999, she said that one of the worst parts was waking up and feeling discomfort from the tubes and IV lines.

Still, "we pray that every day will be a better day. [The doctors say] that the liver and kidney seem to be working."

She said that even though her mother has had her transplants, the family intends to continue to raise awareness of the need for organ donations.

Bone marrow clinic draws more than 100 potential donors

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A stronger than anticipated turnout for a Winnipeg Jewish community bone marrow clinic led organizers to schedule a second day.

"We did so well on the Sunday [Nov. 19] that we decided to have it again on Wednesday evening, tying it in with parent-teacher meetings at [Gray Academy of Jewish Education] and the Jewish Book Fair," said Stephanie Jacobs-Lockhart, leadership development director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's young adult division (YAD), which organized the Giving the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Donor Drive at the Asper Jewish Community Centre.

Jacobs-Lockhart said 116 people were tested.

Every year, she said, thousands of people are stricken with leukemia and other blood-related diseases. In the past, such a diagnosis often meant certain death. Chemotherapy and radiation treatments could often induce remission, but rarely offer a cure.

Today, transplantation of healthy stem cells donated from related and unrelated people offers hope to many patients suffering from these diseases.

Since tissue type is inherited, like eye or hair color, Jacobs-Lockhart said, a patient's best chance of finding a genetic match lies with people of similar ethnic ancestry. Unfortunately, minorities are poorly represented in the worldwide donor pool.

YAD's donor drive aimed to help increase the availability of potential matches for Jewish people in need. The Holocaust severed bloodlines, so Jewish representation in the worldwide donor pool is particularly low.

Jacobs-Lockhart said the testing process was free, fast, and painless – requiring only a swab of cells from inside the potential donor's cheek. No blood was drawn at this initial stage.

While Toronto's Jewish community held a bone marrow clinic at about the same time as the YAD clinic, the two were not directly related.

Toronto's drive focused on finding a match for one Toronto-area person who needs a transplant. Jacobs-Lockhart noted that the donors who came out to the Winnipeg drive will be entered in the Gift of Life's registry of volunteer donors for the benefit of patients worldwide who need life-saving matches.

"Perhaps a match will be found among our group for the individual in Toronto," Jacobs-Lockhart says.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION: The London Jewish Film Festival hosted 1,153 elementary and high school students on Nov. 20 from 15 schools in the Thames Valley District School Board (TVDSB) and the London District Catholic School Board for three screenings of Paper Clips and one screening of Knowledge is the Beginning. The latter shows the development of a youth orchestra culled from Israel, the Palestinian territories, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, while Paper Clips chronicles a middle school in rural Tennessee that honoured the Jews murdered in the Shoah by collecting six million paper clips and putting them in a railway car used during the war. Holocaust survivor Eva Olsson, centre, gave a 30-minute talk after each screening of Paper Clips about the horrors she saw in Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen.

Local gymnast eyes Beijing Olympics

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Fourteen years is a long time to spend concentrating on any one thing, but Marci Bernholtz has done it with dedication.

The 18-year-old Toronto native is one of Canada's premier gymnasts and is looking forward to the 2008 Beijing Summer Olympics.

From Oct. 13 to Oct. 31, Bernholtz accompanied Team Canada to Aarhus, Denmark, to compete in the 39th World Gymnastic Championships before moving on to Germany for a World Cup event.

Aarhus was a first step toward team qualifying for the 2008 Beijing Summer Olympics.

The Canadian team placed 14th overall.

"We qualified for next year's world championships in September," Bernholtz said. "[But] we'll need to qualify in the top 12 in order to send a full team to the 2008 Olympics."

It wasn't an easy trip for Bernholtz.

She competed with a chronic knee injury that her coaching staff estimated left her with just 60 per cent mobility.

"But they still wanted her on the team. She's still that good," said Donna Katz, program director of the ASF Gymnastics Club in Thornhill, Bernholtz's long-time training facility.

Bernholtz managed to place 11th out of 22 on the uneven bars and 12th out of 22 on the beam in Germany on Oct. 27.

Gymnastics has always been a part of Bernholtz's life.

Her parents noticed a natural aptitude in her when she was very young and encouraged her to try athletics.

Once enrolled, Bernholtz's abilities attracted professional coaches and she soon began competitive training.

But she said she couldn't have done it without her parents.

"They are incredible. They support me so much and made so many sacrifices," she said.

Bernholtz began training at ASF at age four and by 16 was a member of the 2004 Olympic team.

As a further testament to her abilities, she maintains a gruelling 35 hour-a-week training schedule and still manages to excel in school.

Last June, her athletic and academic work ethic paid dividends when UCLA offered her a full scholarship upon graduating from Thornhill Secondary School's elite athletics program.

Bernholtz decided to defer acceptance until after the 2008 Summer Olympics.

"I'm taking some time off school right now. But I just signed my letter of intent with UCLA and I'm going there after Beijing," she said.

Once there, Bernholtz will study physiological sciences.

"I've always been interested in human kinetics and the body," she said. "So I think I'll [choose] a medical career. We'll see how it goes."

In the meantime, Bernholtz is focused on one thing: qualifying for the 2008 Olympics.

Her coaches have set up a schedule that will allow her knee to recover while improving her routines.

"I can't train the way I used to, so I've adapted my training," she said. "That's been really helpful on the body."

Bernholtz is taking her road to Beijing one step at a time.

Despite her experience, she knows she must first maintain her place on team Canada's roster before thinking about Beijing.

"If I make it, it'll be amazing," she said. "I'm just hoping to go out there, do the best that I can and hit all my routines."

When asked what advice she would have for children hoping to follow in her footsteps, Bernholtz said they should expect a lot of hard work, but also much reward.

"The experiences you'll have will be incredible, and you'll remember them forever," she said.

Police shoot fan assaulting supporter of Israeli team

Jerusalem Post

PARIS — A plainclothes police officer shot into a crowd of skirmishing soccer fans in Paris last Thursday as he tried to protect supporters of Hapoel Tel Aviv, killing one person and injuring another, police said.

The late night incident at a McDonald's fast food restaurant near the Parc des Princes stadium occurred after Hapoel Tel Aviv defeated Paris Saint-Germain (PSG) 4-2 in a UEFA Cup soccer match.

The police officer, later identified as Antoine Granomort, was trying to protect a Hapoel Tel Aviv fan set upon by some 150 PSG supporters, police said.

The officer lobbed tear gas when the crowd went after the Hapoel supporter, then fired two shots, "having been driven into a corner," police said.

Two PSG fans were injured. One died later, police said. The prosecutor's office identified the dead man as Julien Quemener.

Describing the moments preceding the shooting, police union official Luc Poignant said, "They were shouting 'filthy Jew' and when they saw our colleague, who comes from the Caribbean, they also yelled, 'filthy black, we're going to get you.'"

Police said the two men who were shot were members of PSG's far-right fan base that has a notorious violent and racist history.

Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy said some PSG fans shouted "Death to the Jew" as they attacked the Hapoel fan, whom officials said was French. The police officer first responded with tear gas, but was knocked to the ground by a blow to the head and kick to the stomach, Sarkozy said. He then drew his gun and opened fire.

Paris prosecutor Jean-Claude Marin said the PSG supporters had made Nazi salutes and shouted, "Le Pen, president," a reference to Jean-Marie Le Pen, leader of the extreme-right National Front party.

APPLE LATKES

2 eggs, well beaten
1 1/2 cup orange juice
2 cup flour
1 tsp baking powder
Dash of salt
1/4 - 1/2 cup sugar depending on taste
3 medium apples, peeled and coarsely grated
Vegetable oil for frying
Confectioner's sugar

Mix eggs with orange juice in a bowl. In a separate bowl combine the flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. Add dry ingredients to the egg mixture along with the grated apples. Heat a thin layer of oil in a skillet. Allowing 1 large tablespoon of batter per latke or pancake, drop into the hot oil. Cook about 2 minutes on each side, or until slightly golden.

Drain on paper towels, sprinkle with confectioners' sugar, and serve.

Yield: Approx. 3 dozen latkes.

BROTHERS FIGHTING FIRES

In recognition of the donation of three mini-pumpers by Canadians Gerald Schwartz and his wife, Heather Reisman, to the firefighters of Akko, Nazareth and Safed, a special ceremony involving firefighters from both countries was held last week in Safed. From left are Ontario's minister of community safety and correctional services, Monte Kwinte; Gerald Schwartz; Toronto fire chief, William Stewart; an unidentified Israeli fire official; Ontario's deputy fire marshal, Douglas Crawford; another unidentified Israeli fire official; and Israel's fire and rescue commissioner, Shimon Romach, stand in front of one of the donated mini-pumpers. Indifference: you're the other half

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Don't get caught up in reports about the world standing by while Iran and Korea are building their nuclear arsenals, and while the Sudanese government is slowly crushing Darfur. Don't listen to pundits who come to town and criticize World War II Jewish leaders for remaining quiet while Jews were killed in Europe.

Don't, because this is only half the story. You are the other half.

It's so easy to blame "the world" for its silence. Yet how often have most Jews in Toronto of any age asked themselves, "What would I have done in the 1940s to save Jews and so many others? And what am I doing today?"

Ask yourself the following questions – honestly and without bias. If you answer "no" to most of them, you may want to rethink your position about your place in the world and your response to its ills.

• Am I truly aware that millions of people have been murdered, thrown out of their homes, raped and tortured in Darfur?

• Have I contacted my local MP, rabbi, social action committee or local organizations such as Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan to physically and directly address the war in Sudan?

• Have I accepted the reality that while a number of Jewish university students and local Jewish community members are working hard to fight these evil acts of genocide and cruelty, most of us are not?

• Have I asked myself: Where was the world while Jews were being killed in Auschwitz? If so, why aren't I asking the same questions now as countless millions of people in our world are dying in refugee camps, at the ends of machetes and guns and from infectious diseases that can be prevented?

• Do I know that Iran is building a nuclear bomb and that its "leadership" has stated clearly that they will obliterate Israel? What have I done to actively fight and protest this?

• Am I so disturbed by the fact children are losing their lives in countless war zones throughout the world that I have asked my shul leaders to say prayers for them?

• Have I attended more Holocaust program than I can remember and ever gone home and written down: "Tomorrow I am going to throw myself into saving the world, and teach my children how to do the same"?

• Am I convinced that I am powerless to change anything, so I don't even try?

Be honest with yourself. If you simply don't care, then don't criticize the rest of the world for being indifferent. If you find it easy to blame the problems of the world on our leaders, ask yourself why you're not a leader, be it of a group of five or an assembly of thousands.

It's easy to sit back and feel awful about being persecuted – in fact, it's almost pleasurable – but it's courageous to stand up and fight when you're able to. Get out there and change our world. There is more to being a Jew than simply reading shocking headlines and applauding speakers bearing sad messages. To be a Jew is to fight back.

We know this because we applaud those who have done exactly that. We celebrate the courage of Moses, who stood up to the mighty Pharaoh, and we applaud the sheer guts of the men and women who fought for Israel's survival in all of its wars.

Tomorrow, when you read your newspaper, notice the headlines on each page in the front section. Over and over, you will discover death and destruction. Our world is filled with it, and those affected cry out for help to those of us who live in our oasis of a country.

To be a Jew is to fight back.

Fight back. We expected others to do so.

Plan in advance for children in the wedding party

By GAYLE KERTZMAN
Special to The CJN

Just a month before my third birthday, I was to have the honour of being a flower girl at my uncle's wedding. Unfortunately, I never made it down the aisle, because I had a temper tantrum just before the ceremony.

The only memory I have of this event is a picture taken of my mother as she walked down the aisle. Needless to say, she didn't look happy.

Now fast forward 30 years later. History was about to repeat itself. My three-year-old daughter, Elana, was going to walk down the aisle as a flower girl at her uncle's wedding. I was determined that her fate would be different from mine.

We bought the dress a year in advance, we had been to all the parties leading up to the wedding and we had been reading picture books about being a flower girl. All those months of role playing and discussion finally culminated as the big day was upon us.

Things ran like clockwork. Elana had her hair done, she had her nap, she posed for pictures, she ate her snack and she went to the bathroom. The moment we had talked about for months was finally here – we were about to walk down the aisle.

Well, it seems the pressure of the moment got to Elana and she began to cry. She needed to go to the bathroom! My daughter, who could hold it in for days, all of a sudden needed to go – but the procession had started.

I told her to hold it in, but that only made her more anxious to go, so I attempted to take her to the bathroom before we walked down the aisle. That freaked her out and she began to scream – the clear beginning of a temper tantrum. All I could hear was my future sister-in-law saying she hoped Elana would make it down the aisle, my mother telling me to take her away, and some late-coming guests asking what was going on.

Thank goodness the best man, my husband, came to the rescue. He grabbed the teary-eyed Elana, told her to stop crying and wiped her eyes. Then the two of them walked into the sanctuary and down the aisle. She did it! She made it down the aisle.

The rest of the evening went without incident, and Elana and I danced all night. I mentally noted that I should jot this milestone down in her baby book, and come to think of it, she never did mention the bathroom again that night!

My story is not an uncommon one when young children are part of the bridal party. While children under the age of six can look absolutely adorable, they are often associated with an added stress for the bride and groom.

Here are some of the lessons I learned to help alleviate that stress:

- Even though it's nice to include a niece or nephew in the your big day, be aware of a child's limitations. Remember it's easier to reason with a five-year-old, than with a two-year-old in the middle of a temper tantrum.
- Schedule photographs as late in the day as possible. Many young children need an early afternoon nap, and without it, they won't survive the excitement of a long day.
- Be flexible – anything can happen at the last minute. If the child chooses not to walk alone, but wants to walk with Mommy or Daddy, so be it.
- If the children's parents are standing under the chupah, have someone they are familiar with waiting for them in the front row. It also helps to have a new book or quiet toy waiting for them at the end of the aisle.
- Seat children near an exit, in case they become to noisy or restless and their caregiver needs to leave the ceremony discreetly.
- At the reception, have a small loot bag of treats waiting at the table. Fill it with dollar-store finds, such as activity books, crayons, stickers and stamps. This is a good way to keep the children occupied during the speeches.
- Remember to order child-friendly meals. A hungry child, is a cranky child.
- If there are a number of babies in your immediate family, try to set up a quiet room with a portable crib and change station. Hire a babysitter, so that parents can enjoy themselves.

Gayle Kertzman is the mother of two daughters, Elana and Eryn, and also runs her own business as a wedding and special event planner.

Judaica shopping made simple

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Shopping for Judaica can be expensive and difficult, but Chuck and Barbara Elnekave make it easy.

Last February, the couple opened The Israeli Source: the Ultimate Jewish Shopping Experience gift store at 60 Doncaster Ave., Unit 1, in Thornhill.

Growing up in Toronto's Jewish community made them realize that the costs involved with "buying Jewish" shouldn't be prohibitive.

They practise that wholesale-pricing philosophy every day at their store.

"We felt there was a need for a low-cost alternative to the traditional judaica 'boutique' that is more prevalent in Toronto," said Chuck Elnekave. "Kind of like the big-box mentality, but instead of being applied to books, like Chapters, or hardware, like Home Depot, we applied that approach to Judaica."

It's definitely something new in the industry.

Customers can walk into The Israeli Source's 3,000-square-foot store and shop for what they need without all the "fancy-shmancy" trappings of other, more upscale Judaica shops, Elnekave said.

"We're more of an 'active warehouse,'" he said. "The customer shops for products that are all on display, [not for] items that are kept in a back room."

And because The Israeli Source buys products in bulk, savings are passed on to customers.

But don't think this more casual approach means the store isn't fully prepared to meet your needs.

The Israeli Source stocks a variety of gift items for many occasions. Whether you want Aleph Bet magnetic toys for toddlers or havdalah sets for your home, the Elnekaves have it.

Want technology? They have that, too.

From specialty religious CDs to the mainstream DVD comedy The Hebrew Hammer to Hebrew keyboards, it's all there.

Additionally, their knowledgeable staff is always on hand to answer questions or help customers find items in the store.

The Israeli Source also has some terrific holiday gift ideas.

"We have some special items for Chanukah this year," said Elnekave. "We have an array of unique menorahs by Israeli designers and a selection of sterling silver menorahs by Hazorfim [Home Jewelry]."

When asked what makes The Israeli Source the ultimate Jewish shopping experience, Elnekave answered succinctly, "Low prices, great service, and extensive selection."

Simple.

Good service is key, and Marriott has it

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When it's show time for your party, phenomenal service at the event venue is paramount, says Debra Hughson.

"One of the first features people are looking for is that the level of service is tailored to their specific needs," says Hughson, sales and marketing director at the Toronto Marriott Downtown Eaton Centre.

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☑ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

The Marriott features a special "red coat service" whereby a designated person, attired in a red coat, is on duty throughout your affair to ensure everything runs smoothly.

"If you need a quick change in the room temperature, or there's a request for a meal change, this person is at your beck and call, throughout the night," she says, likening the role to a maitre d'.

Since there are numerous vendors involved in most events, Hughson notes that it's important for the venue to work collaboratively with all third-party vendors before, during and even after an affair.

"Whether it's the DJ, band or the special props and décor brought in, even if this is done through a third-party vendor, the onus is on [the venue] to collaborate to make sure everyone is aligned," Hughson reveals.

Party venues are becoming increasingly versatile these days, able to hold many different kinds of social and corporate events.

The downtown Marriott has a total of 18,000 square feet of event space, including a grand ballroom that can host 850 people.

Affairs at the Marriott range from weddings and bar mitzvahs to corporate galas and fundraisers.

So how do you find the right venue for your specific party?

While size and ambience are obvious factors, you'd be advised to pay attention to other details, including lighting and layout.

"You can transform any room through the lighting, so it's important to ask the venue about what types of equipment they have and their ability to change the lighting," Hughson says.

In terms of layout, be sure to check out where the kitchen is located.

"If the kitchen is located close to the ballroom, that makes a huge difference," she says. "Because if someone has a last-minute request for a vegetarian meal, for example, we can service that relatively quickly because everything is contained on one floor."

The same applies to shipping and receiving.

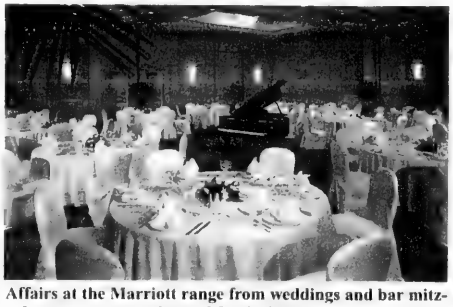
To that end, if your party involves bringing in audiovisual equipment and other amenities relating to décor, it's good to have shipping and receiving located near the party room.

Party venues book up quickly, so Hughson encourages people to book between one to two years in advance.

For events at downtown hotels such as the Marriott, weekdays are considered peak time, so scheduling weddings on the weekend may be ideal.

Although the Marriott doesn't have a kosher kitchen, kosher meals can be brought in by an off-site kosher caterer.

For more information about the Toronto Marriott Downtown Eaton Centre, visit www.marriotteatoncentre.com, or call 416-597-9200.



Affairs at the Marriott range from weddings and bar mitzvahs to corporate galas and fundraisers.

Fine kosher catering for generations

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Every simchah needs a nosh, every chag some chow, and what better way to get food than from two caterers who know the Toronto Jewish community like the back of their seder plates?

Nearly 75 years ago, when Zuchter Berk went into the restaurant business, little did he know his entrepreneurial endeavour would become synonymous with fine kosher catering.

Certified by the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR), Zuchter Berk Catering operates on the philosophy that "execution is everything."

Now run by partners David Berk, Walter Vaz and Isaac Drookman, the company can do it all.

From the smallest family dinner to the grandest event venue in the city, Zuchter's can see to the food needs of the Jewish community from top to bottom.

"We listen to our clients so that we may give the professional advice they depend upon," states their website.

Zuchter Berk also recently started offering full-service dairy catering for baby-namings and brit milot. "We will cater to people's homes," said Vaz.

Beyond that, they are also the exclusive kosher caterer for Air Canada and various other airlines, and they cater to corporate events and sponsor Jewish charitable events every year.

"Every year we pick a [charitable] organization to fund," said Vaz. "It's a way for us to give back to the community."

Zuchter Berk is dedicated to staying in the know because even their traditional clients are starting to experiment with new food ideas, said Vaz.

"We're always sourcing new ingredients and new products," he said

The company can also help plan arrangements for wine and liquor, linens, chair covers, flowers, table settings and other amenities such as chocolate fountains, martini bars and ice sculptures.

For more information, call 416-386-1086 or visit www.zuchterberk.com.

Another company providing Toronto's Jewish community with great food from generation to generation is Rose Lazar Catering Services.

Named after the company matriarch who founded the business 45 years ago (and who is still dispensing advice and guidance), they have consistently produced adaptive, delicious and nutritious kosher creations for their clientele.

"In today's environment, people are more knowledgeable in food preparation and ingredients," said David Lazar, the company's vice-president of operations.

That might be daunting for some, but at Rose Lazar, it's welcomed.

"Our clients come to us with all these wonderful ideas and we tailor [our] menus to accommodate their wishes," he said.

In keeping with their clients' ever-increasing needs for new taste blends, Rose Lazar has created new entrées such as glazed apple chicken, sesame orange chicken and Thai coconut chicken.

"The hardest part is adapting recipes to meet the kosher requirements," said Lazar.

But adapt they do.

Heather Lazar, the company's culinary researcher and tester of new recipes, ensures their menu is always de rigeur.

Rose Lazar caters solely to kosher events and is the exclusive caterer for the Lodzer Centre Congregation.

"We are a family-oriented business," said Lazar. "We treat each customer as a member of our extended family [and] provide personalized attention to all details of the simchah... to ensure that the celebration is a worry-free event."

Rose Lazar Catering suggests calling them at 416-633-0344 for any questions customers have about setting up menus for their upcoming events.

Other kosher caterers advertising in this supplement are: Caterers York/Sweet York Desserts, 416-783-4293; Ely's Fine Foods, 416-782-3231.

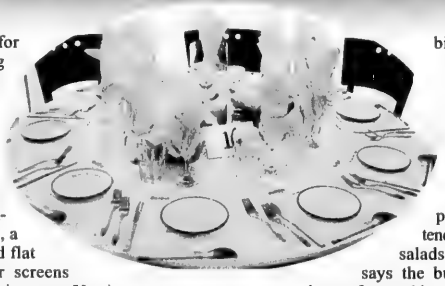
Any rock 'n' roll buff will know that the place to check out great music memorabilia is the Hard Rock Café. But they probably don't know that the same place that holds your favourite rockers' guitar can also throw a mean wedding reception.

There are plenty of reasons why the Hard Rock is a great place to have a party, says Marcello DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager for the Hard Rock Café (416-362-3636) on Yonge Street at Dundas in Toronto, but the main attraction is what's on its walls. "There's already a theme for the event," he says. "Very little decoration is needed. Most families end up requesting centrepieces and that's it. There are guitars, costumes and hats from artists all over the world."

If you've been to the Hard Rock, you might be wondering where events are held. Above the restaurant, on the second floor, is a big room that can hold about 150 people and a DJ for entertainment. "Most of our private events are held on the second floor," says DeOliveira, "about 80 per cent of them." The other 20 per cent are held on both floors. "You can have the reception on the second floor, keeping it casual with not a lot of seating. Then you can move to the main floor for dinner and move back upstairs for dessert. Using both floors will definitely wow your guests."



The café also has a few things to wow their clients. In-house lighting, a PA system and flat panel monitor screens make entertaining easy. You just need to bring the DJ.

But what if you want your party kosher? No problem, says DeOliveira. For an extra fee, clients can hire an outside caterer for the party. If a bride and groom only need a couple of kosher meals, the Hard Rock staff will serve them along with the rest of the food. But for those who prefer to use the Hard Rock's kitchen, it's got a lot to offer.

"Salmons and steaks are popular," says DeOliveira. "Adults are mostly going with plated services with different choices of entrées." Kids, though, have always gone gaga over the buffet and that hasn't changed in 2006. "A buffet for children is the easiest way for them to eat. They can eat at their own pace. Kids are usually running around and dancing, so they don't eat at the same. They go grab a little bit of food, and then they're off and running again."

The kids' meal offers the usual buffet staples: pizza, chicken tenders, pastas and salads. DeOliveira says the buffet includes plenty of vegetables, too. "We work with our kitchen to develop menus that parents and children will be happy with."

For dessert, the Hard Rock can serve up a chocolate fountain or a make-your-own sundae station. "Kids are provided with ice cream, and we have several choices of toppings, gummy bears and M&Ms. They can go crazy and top the ice cream with whatever they want."

Besides the food options and the memorabilia on the walls, DeOliveira points out that the Hard Rock's location is another big selling point. "We aren't underground, there are lots of windows, and whether your event is during the day or at night, you can look at one of the busiest intersections in the city."

But a busy intersection can pose security concerns, which is something the Hard Rock is aware of. "We have security at every event," says DeOliveira, "but especially when he have an event with kids. We make sure every exit is monitored and kids can't leave the building without an adult. If we can't see a family member parked right in front of the café, we make sure they [kids] don't leave by themselves."

With that in mind, DeOliveira wants parents of 13-year-olds to consider using the hard rock as their place to party. Bar and bat mitzvah receptions have been held at the location for a year now. In 2006, they held eight parties, and that number will grow next year. The café already has booking inquiries for 2008.

If you're considering booking the place, there's one other thing DeOliveira can offer – great customer service. "We listen to our clients," he says. "That's the most important thing – to get feedback on our menus and our services so we can keep things easy and simple."

Liberty Grand offers range of venues to suit your needs

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Being attracted to the look, feel and overall ambience of a party venue is a subjective thing.

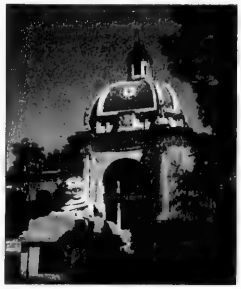
As a party host, you will have your own unique preferences, and the only way to discover a venue that meets your needs is to visit the site.

"Come in and see the venue," advises Robert Rosset, director of sales and catering with the Liberty Entertainment Group.

"The bride or groom should bring other people they are close to with them and they'll know whether the venue… has the right look and feel. After that decision is made, we'll walk them through the costs."

To that end, staying within your budget is a fundamental consideration, so the venue's price has to be right.

When figuring out the dollars and cents, be sure to factor in the price not only for the venue, but also the food and beverages.



The Liberty Grand

"We don't do booking until people know what the food and beverages cost," says Rosset, noting that the Liberty Entertainment Group encompasses 12 properties, ranging from restaurants and nightclubs to upscale lounges and banquet halls.

Once the price is right, securing a date is the next step.

Rosset notes that dates get booked quickly and therefore encourages clients to arrange a date as much as 1½ years in advance.

Many venues have special event professionals on staff who can assist with the booking of other vendors, though Rosset says clients are welcome to have as much independence as they like in this regard.

"Most facilities are moving further away from providing the one-stop shop," he says. "We can provide support, but we'll encourage you to do your own research."

For instance, the Liberty Entertainment Group welcomes kosher caterers to provide food at its venues, but the party host will typically line up a kosher caterer on his or her own.

Food is a major part of all parties, and Rosset says many venues are now customizing menus to cater to what clients, and their guests, want.

"The executive chef will design the menu that is somewhat specific to the occasion and the demographics," he relates.

He adds that a growing trend at bar and bat mitzvahs is food stations, where a chef prepares and serves some food on-site, right in front of guests.

Another trend caters to guests' appetites for a late-night snack.

"Weddings and corporate events are now offering midnight Chinese buffets, with things like chicken balls and fried rice," he explains. "It doesn't have to be Chinese food, but the idea is to provide late night snacks."

Venues offer the best of settings for simchahs

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

With hundreds of party venues to choose from, it's often hard for people to decide where to hold their special event. Thankfully, the following two locales in the GTA offer some of the best settings for simchahs.

The Royalton Banquet hall in Woodbridge has provided a glorious location for kosher events for years.

Its three main rooms have hosted scores of simchahs and will continue to do so for years to come. But in May 2007, the Royalton will proudly unveil its sister venue, the Bellvue Manor, giving clients two excellent choices for party locales.

"We have listened to clients and taken the next step in event planning," states Robert Marra, president of the venues, on the Bellvue Manor website.

"People want the 'country manor' type of look now," says Marra "We wanted a new venue, something nice that no one else has." And it seems they will accomplish just that.

When construction is finished, Bellvue Manor will boast a kosher kitchen, four banquet rooms, with two smaller, restaurant-like dining rooms upstairs and will accommodate 900 partyers with ease.

"Bellevue Manor will look and feel like a grand country estate. With its old-world elegance and our reputation for exceptional food and service, you can rest assured you have booked the best," claims the website.

And the word is already spreading.

The not-yet-built venue is already booked Saturdays throughout 2007.

Though there is still availability, "it's going fast," says Marra. He advises those wishing to book for next year to do so soon to be one of the first to have a simchah at what is sure to be one of th e most talked-about new venues,

Another new venue is the Easton Group's Hilton Garden Inn and Toscana Banquet and Conference Centre in Vaughan.

The Toscana offers party-planners a terrificly versatile banquet hall facility.

The spacious ballroom offers 7,590 square feet of room for dining, dancing and schmoozing. It can also be partitioned into three separate halls at 2,500 square feet each.

The hall accommodates 800 people in its theatre-style setup and 500 with its seating setup.

Reetu Gupta, director of marketing for the Easton Group, says the Toscana was built with Jewish clintele in mind.

"In our hall we have a retractable skylight built specifically for the chupah," she said. "It's the most requested room for Jewish weddings."

But space is at a premium at the Toscana.

"People should book sooner rather than later because we are starting to fill up for next year," said Gupta. "Depending on dates needed there is some limited availability."

The Toscana banquet hall also offers great technological conveniences.

A surround-sound speaker system is complimented by mobile lighting that can make shapes on walls and even recreate corporate logos for a "wallwash" effect.

What's more, pinpoint lighting is embedded in the ceiling and can illuminate guest tables in many colours if you want a colour-themed event.

"So you don't need DJs to come into the hall with their systems because everything is already there. It's less hassle and is a lot cleaner [to set up]," said Gupta.

Speeches with sincerity and style

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

You can probably count on the fingers of one hand the really good speeches you've heard, but you'd need a whole extra body to start counting the lousy ones.

Sisters Marsha Zinberg and Cheryl Plener, of The Write Touch (647-428-1150), help clients create "speeches with sincerity and style."

If your first thought when it comes to speechwriters is politicians, forget canned sentimentality and cheesy sound bites. Zinberg and Plener don't usually even describe themselves as speechwriters. "We help shape the speech that you'd like to give," Zinberg says.

Whether you're confident about what to say or foundering for ideas that won't leave listeners yawning, The Write Touch offers a buffet of services you may not even realize you need until it's too late.

"People just don't spend enough time preparing," Plener says. "They leave the speech to the last minute."

"They feel they can wing it, not accounting for how emotional you feel at the time," but then they're "surprised nothing comes at that moment."

From wording invitations, shaping and polishing presentations and delivery coaching to the wording of thank-you notes, Zinberg and Plener can help craft every word that goes into your event.

The two bring a wealth of experience with words spoken and written to their business. Zinberg has 23 years' experience as a corporate spokesperson for a publishing company, and Plener's background is in drama and communications. "We complement each other," Zinberg says.

Beginning with a consultation three months before the event, The Write Touch gets clients thinking about what to say. Clients write a draft, in paragraph or point form, touching on topics or impressions like "there's a great story about my Aunt Sue that I'd like to tell."

The Write Touch helps clients create speeches with sincerity and style.

Then The Write Touch takes over, editing and polishing the speech into a presentation that is original, interesting, heartfelt and honest.

"We tweak it," Plener says. "We edit it down." They find the intentions behind the words – and help choose the best possible words. "We see they're trying to go someplace… ask, 'Is this what you're trying to say?' and make suggestions like, 'Can we say it this way?'"

Often listeners don't have all the information they need to understand a story or a reference in a speech. "We'll say, 'What do you mean here about the tennis game?' and have them explain it," she says.

They also ensure that nothing gets left out. At one bar mitzvah, Plener says she noticed that the father's speech accidentally omitted a younger brother who was acting as MC. A bride may forget to thank her in-laws or maid of honour – small things that are often lost in event-planning chaos.

The Write Touch can also co-ordinate all the speeches in a family or wedding party, meaning less repetition. "People don't show each other their speeches," Plener says. "They get stuck… like if the groom plays hockey, everybody talks about the groom playing hockey. After you've heard that five times, you're no longer interested."

Plener's theatre background serves her well – a touch of drama is at least as important as good writing. "Maybe they've written a good speech, but you can't hear it – they don't know how to use the mike properly, they don't have confidence," she says.

The Write Touch offers delivery coaching, with the option of audio or videotaping. "People have no idea how they come across," until they see or hear themselves speak, she adds.

Speeches are too often overlooked while spending a lot of money to create the perfect simchah or corporate program. "You're standing in a beautiful dress, in a lovely room, offering people a beautiful meal… it would also be nice if you spoke elegantly and eloquently, and said what you had to say about this beautiful time in your life," Plener says.

Rebecca, a 24-year-old bride who recently used The Write Touch for her wedding, agrees. "You put so much time in to your flowers, makeup, dress," but speeches are "one of the most important things," she says.

"Cheryl gave me tips in terms of my presentation… she made me own the room." She's still getting compliments months later, saying her speech "resonated… because they were my experiences, my feelings; I wasn't just quoting a beautiful poem."

Plener says: "It is their speech, their vocabulary, the way they tell a story… they're the one delivering it. There are no cookie-cutter speeches."

It's "going to be their speech, not a canned speech," Zinberg agrees. "It's their own touches. We want them to deliver the speech that they want to give – but we are going to help them do it."

The view from the Park Hyatt in downtown Toronto.

Park Hyatt offers luxury at a competitive price

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

A hotel offering a variety of services may be the ideal venue for your celebration, because if it has many of the things that you need in-house, you save money and make it easier to organize your event.

In downtown Toronto, one such hotel is the Park Hyatt Toronto (416-925-1234, www.parkhyatttoronto.com). Not far from the carriage trade shops of Yorkville, it's at the northwest corner of Bloor Street and Avenue Road.

Catering director Michael Rosen takes pride in the hotel's high standard of service.

Whether it's a gala affair, or one that's small and intimate, there's always plenty of qualified, helpful staff on hand.

"Whether it's a bar or bat mitzvah or a wedding, every party gets the five-star treatment," Rose says. "That's what we're all about."

Rosen adds that "when you're making a wedding [or any other milestone event], you have only one shot. There's no hit or miss."

The Park Hyatt has a kosher kitchen, and at every kosher event, a mashgiach is on site for the duration of the party.

And while Park Hyatt is a luxury establishment, Rosen assures clients that its catering prices are reasonable.

"Kosher doesn't have to cost a fortune. Our prices are competitive in the kosher marketplace. For the quality of the food, service and surroundings, we offer great value."

Nor is kosher cuisine restricted to the traditional repertoire of dishes, delicious and comforting as they are.

"Our kitchen staff is talented and creative," Rosen says. "The greatest compliment we get is how good our food is."

Rosen credits executive chef Joan Monfaredi, who also oversees the kosher kitchen, for the Park Hyatt's high standard of both cuisine and presentation.

She will create any menu style, be it an eight-course dinner or a buffet, he says.

Rosen points out that the Park Hyatt has its own china and flatware. Also, nearly everything, from hors d'oeuvres to desserts, is made in-house, which further reduces costs.

The Park Hyatt also has more than one party venue to choose from. On the 18th floor, the Rooftop Salon can accommodate 102 guests for a sit-down dinner with dancing, or 120 for a meal without dancing.

On a clear day, you can see the lake from the Rooftop Salon, which is above and across the street from the Royal Ontario Museum.

"It's the perfect setting," Rosen says. "There's a small wraparound terrace, and the view is breathtaking."

And in the winter, the working fireplace makes the room even more inviting.

The Queen's Park Ballroom can hold 270 to 280 guests, with dance floor and band. If a ceremony is held there, and the hotel is charging for food and beverages, it doesn't charge for the ballroom. And a wedding includes a complimentary deluxe guest room for the bride and groom.

The Park Hyatt's social catering manager is Donald Hillis. Rosen praises him highly for his experience, attention to detail and likeable personality, calling him "our resident wedding specialist."

Currently, the Park Hyatt is offering a special program, called "One Perfect Day, Two Perfect Nights," for couples holding weddings there before June 30.

"The couple will enjoy two complimentary nights at any Hyatt resort or any Park Hyatt Hotel worldwide," Rosen says.

You can use it for your anniversary, or for a romantic getaway.

Choose a photographer who gives it their best shot

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

At any wedding or other personal milestone, you want lasting mementos worthy of the event.

This is especially true of photos. Long after food, music and even decor are faded memories, the pictures will remain, so let them be the best you can get.

Both Greg Dean of Signature Studios (416-784-4488 www.signature-online.com), and Adrian Holmes of Adrian Holmes Photography (416-481-9522, www.holmesphoto.com) have reputations for fine work, and they encourage you to insist on the highest standards.

If you look at their photos, you will see evidence of this. Both men show an ability to break down the old, stereotypical boundary between commercial and artistic photography, combining soft edges with subtle colour.

When choosing a photographer, Dean says, consider quality of work first of all. Then make sure you're compatible and that you see eye to eye, "with the same vision and sense of humour," as he puts it.

If Holmes himself were choosing a photographer, he says he'd place a lot of value on referrals and reputation. Also, he emphasizes that a photographer should have experience in a given market.

Pictures by Signature Studios.

"Most of my business is with the Jewish community," he says. "But a photographer has to respect the different customs in all the different communities. What's going on at a given moment in a ceremony, and what it means, has a direct bearing on where the cameras should be."

Yours and the photographer's personalities should work well together, both Dean and Holmes advise, and he or she should mesh well with other party professionals such as the videographer.

A good photographer, Holmes continues, must have some organizational ability.

"If someone books me, he also books my staff. Along with taking photos, this entails answering messages and returning calls. Politeness and organizational ability are closely related," he says.

"Taste and tact are also important," Holmes adds. "A client should like my style, but I should also be ready to adjust my style to the client's tastes."

So a photographer should be flexible and versatile, not a "one-trick pony," he adds.

Versatility, in Holmes' view, includes working under difficult conditions.

A rain shower at an outdoor event, he says, won't stop him from doing his best work – it's just a challenge to overcome.

"As a client, you should be paying for guaranteed work, knowing your photos will turn out well," he adds.

At the same time, Holmes likes every shoot to be different. He doesn't want to offer a merely competent but predictable service, where you know what you're getting, but it's not exciting.

He wants to give every client and event something unique that can't be duplicated elsewhere.

Also, Holmes thinks ahead: he sees working for a client at one event as a step towards a longer-term relationship.

"If the clients like the wedding pictures I take, the wedding can lead to baby pictures, maybe to bar and bat mitzvahs," he says.

Signature's albums are bound coffee-table books, with spine and attached pages. A wide-angle or panorama shot can be spread across both pages, a format that's ideal for weddings or celebrations such as family reunions, where you want to get everyone in one picture.

Signature will have three photographers present at your wedding. With two cameras going at all times, they can do posed and candid shots at the same time, and someone's always there for backup.

Dean urges you to book your photographer as far ahead as you can – at least a year.

"I have bookings into 2008 and '09," he says.

The more reputable studios, says Holmes, book from six months to a year ahead for weddings, and six months to two years for bar or bat mitzvahs.

PARTY PLANNER

Toronto Party Guide Show is a one-stop extravaganza

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Pictured at the recent Toronto Party Guide show hosted at the Beth Emeth Synagogue are, from left, David Berk, Lynn Cohen, Lorraine Berk, and Walter Vaz (Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers).

Planning your upcoming party can be easy and stress free, thanks to www.torontopartyguide.com and the Toronto Party Guide Show.

Rick Levine, president of Custom Graphics, who organizes the show along with Lynn Cohen and runs the website, says he and Cohen started working together 10 years ago because they wanted the public to be aware of "the quality of products and services out there.

"We also wanted to make life easier for people trying to plan a great party."

Visitors to the show – the next one is Jan. 16 at Le Parc Conference and Banquet Centre – have an opportunity to connect with party planning professionals who can help make any event a success, he said.

"One visit to the show can save a huge number of phone calls and visits. Think of the time people can save."

Rick Levine and Lynn Cohen, show co-ordinators for the Toronto Party Guide event.

Exhibitors at the upcoming show include bands, disc jockeys, caterers, photographers, hotels, party consultants, and florists, as well as people who specialize in balloons, caricatures, dance instruction, novelties, ice sculptures and invitations.

"If you're looking for something special for your party, it will certainly be featured," Levine says,

He says the shows – he and Cohen run about three a year – usually attract between 1,500 and 2,000 people who are planning an event within the next one to three years.

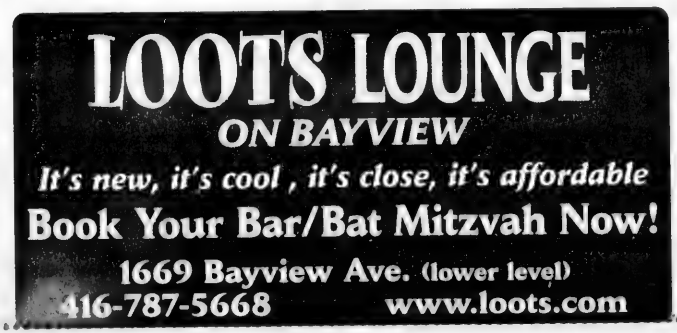
The website can assist them, he says, "because with the comprehensive, updated list of services and professionals, they can plan who they're going to visit."

When visitors attend the show, it's almost like being at a party, Levine says. "They can hear the entertainers, experience the decor, smell the flowers, taste the food samples, and receive a lot of giveaways."

At the pair's last event, held earlier this fall at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, caterer Zuchter Berk did "a phenomenal job," Levine says. "He gave out food samples and put together a sweet table. Visitors really did think they were at a party."

Some people hire professionals on the spot, while others shop around to compare prices. "Many come together with their family, because most parties are a family affair," says Levine.

For information on the show, call Levine at 905-881-6400.



Menswear retailers offer quality, reasonable prices

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

In an age of mass-produced fashion, a truly well-made suit has become something of an art form. And since it seems that tailoring has been forsaken for throwaway clothing, finding a suit worthy of special occasions is one overwhelming task.

Thankfully, there are two men's clothing shops where quality is the most important issue of all.

Korry's (416-463-1115, www.korrys.com) has been offering the best in high-end designer formal and casual menswear for more than 55 years. The shop carries a superb selection of suits, outerwear, denim, sportswear and accessories for men of every age, including well-known European names such as Hugo Boss and Zegna Sport and homegrown brands such as Arnold Brant, Korry's. It's the perfect mix of quality and trend. One of Toronto's most well-renowned retailers, Korry's has built a long clientele list that includes politician John Tory and skater Elvis Stojko.

Korry's is staffed with a friendly and expert staff ready to cater to your every need. "People want to shop here," says Korry's president, Saul Korman.

With a resident tailor on hand to do custom work, Korry's truly acts as a one-stop shop for men's shopping.

Always on top of the latest trends, Korry's maintains a high-fashion edge with its seasonal trunk shows (a traveling collection of designer clothing) and other events. There's more experimentation in the shop's selection of outerwear this season, with velvet and corduroy as the hottest fabrics for men's jackets. And to inject a bit of Hollywood into a wardrobe, mix a velvet blazer with denim pants.

With more than 21 locations across Ontario, Stars Mens Shops (416-650-1404; www.starsmenshops.com) is the surest way to look like a million dollars without spending it. Stars Mens Shops have been catering to men of all ages since the company's inception over 50 years ago in Kitchener, Ont. Jon Strauss, took the business over from his father, Harry, the company's founder.

High-end design from Korry's.

Stars Mens Shops carries the finest quality suits at affordable prices. To keep the prices as low as possible – suits start at just $149 all designing and manufacturing is done in Canada. Stars Mens Shops mixes in-house labels such as Jonathan Robert and Gianni Antonio with international names like Calvin Klein and Perry Ellis. P. Diddy's clothing label, Sean Jean, is sold exclusively through Stars Mens Shops.

Catering to men of all shapes and sizes, Stars Mens Shops' carries size 34 short to 54 tall. The stores carry dress shirts, casual wear and leather outerwear for one-stop shopping.

Top designs from Stars.

Stars Mens Shops across the province are stocked full of brown, brown and more brown, among the hottest colour trends of the season. Contrasting with the brighter golden shades of the season, brown is finally coming back in full force for men this fall.

Whether you're shopping for a simchah or just buying a new polo shirt, with the help of Korry's and Stars Mens Shops, you'll be well dressed for every occasion.

Other men's fashion places are: Crawford Boys, 416-782-8137; J Kaur Manufacturing, K. Barketti, 416-225-6733; Le Club Menswear, 416-488-7848.

Bar mitzvahs in Israel make the milestone unforgettable

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When you compare the view from atop a bimah at one of Toronto's synagogues to the view from atop Masada in Israel, it's no wonder more families are choosing to celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs in the Holy Land.

"We've been [booking bar mitzvah tours] for years. It's nothing new. Although [the number of families doing] it has grown," said Avi Rodak, vice-president of Aufgang Travel, an agency that specializes in trips to Israel.

He said that his agency books about 200 trips a year for families who choose to celebrate this milestone in Israel.

Stanley Morais, Canadian general manager of El Al Israel Airlines, said that during the height of the intifadah in 2000, business from Canada was slow, but it's picked up since then.

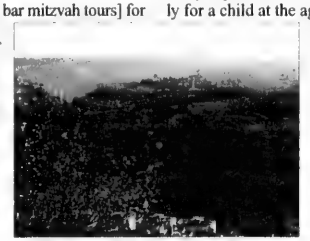
"Families are taking the opportunity to celebrate an important life cycle event from a Jewish perspective while having this opportunity to visit Israel," Morais said.

"Some people join family bar mitzvah groups… Our specialty is that we will put together a tour that is fit for your family," Rodak added.

"Instead of your family, which may be a group of four or 20, being on a bus with other people, going on a fixed itinerary, we customize an itinerary just for you. We plan the programs, book the hotels independently, book the guides independently – it's a tailor-made trip to Israel."

Morais said that some families choose to plan a tour on their own, but he suggests that people work with a professional, because making arrangements from here could be complicated.

"A lot of people do have friends and family in Israel who are willing to work with them, but if you're taking your family on a tour, you need to go do it properly with the guide and driver and really experience Israel to the fullest – especially for a child at the age of 12 or 13, where this impression is going to last them for the rest of their lives," Morais said.



The view from Mount Scopus

Masada

Rodak said his agency is involved in planning the bar mitzvah itself, which is just one morning out of the one-week or two-week tour.

Both Rodak and Morais agreed that the two most popular places to celebrate a bar mitzvah in Israel are the Western Wall or Masada.

"A lot of people do it at Masada because Masada is an example of Jewish strength and Jewish resistance that we will always be there no matter what, and that's why for some people, Masada is still a significant place in terms of doing something like that," Morais said.

But for those looking for alternative locations, Rodak suggests other places in Israel that have breathtaking views of the Old City.

"We've held one at the southern Wall which is in the same area of the Kotel, but around the corner. We've had it at a place called the Haas Promenade [a park in Jerusalem], which has a wonderful overview of the southern part of the city of Jerusalem, and there is another one on Mount Scopus, which has an amazing view of Jerusalem from the north," Rodak said.

While bar and bat mitzvahs in Israel are the most common milestones that North Americans choose to celebrate in Israel, Morais said there is also a growing trend of people getting married in the Jewish state.

"A lot of it is linked to the fact that there is a growing Israeli community here in Toronto and that there is something still very significant about getting married in Israel. Of course, getting married in Israel is very different from having a bar or bat mitzvah, because [a wedding] has to be organized through the rabbinical courts," Morais said.

He said that people often celebrate other milestones in Israel, such as birthdays or wedding anniversaries.

"A lot of people are saying, 'For my 50th birthday, I want to be in Israel with my entire family. For my 35th wedding anniversary, I want to take my children and grandchildren to Israel with us.'"

Regardless of whether you're planning a wedding or a bar mitzvah, the planning should begin about a year in advance, both Morais and Rodak advise.

For more information, call Aufgang Travel at 416-789-7117, or El Al at 416-967-4222.

Inquire about healthy dining options

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Healthy eating is all the rage these days, and in catering circles, that means cooking up customized, nutritious recipes to satisfy clients.

"There is definitely a trend to eat more healthily," says Shawn Smallacombe, president of Catered Affairs by Chapman's, a full-service catering company that started more than 50 years ago.

"We have to accommodate that by customizing menus."

So when clients meet with a caterer to develop a menu for their affair, they are advised to inquire about healthy food options.

For instance, Smallacombe notes that Chapman's frequently uses organic vegetables and pays special attention to how much trans fat is used when preparing meals.

As well, instead of white bread and buns, which have high carbohydrate contents, another option he recommends is pita chips or whole wheat flatbreads.

Another fashionable trend in catering is international foods.

"Everybody loves to sample international fusion cuisine nowadays," says Shana Daniel, corporate and special events planner at Food for Thought Catering & Event Management.

"When you go to a bar mitzvah, you will likely see Japanese food, such as chicken teriyaki, as an hors d'oeuvre."

Food For Thought chef Michael Collis adds that many party hosts are requesting that caterers serve smaller quantities of a variety of foods with each course, a culinary approach known as tapas.

Catered Affairs by Chapman's

"With a tapas-style menu, you might prepare four smaller types of desert on a plate as opposed to just going up to a buffet," he says. "Or you might make a few types of chicken, served with beef or fish."

When meeting with prospective caterers, it's important to feel comfortable with them and be open about your requirements, such as matching food to a theme and ensuring the caterer is aware of your budget.

"If you have budget constraints, the caterer should work within it," Smallacombe says.

☐ Kosher
☑ Non-Kosher

"The client should feel comfortable with the caterer and not pressured."

Daniel agrees.

"We like to meet with the client to get a sense of who they are and what they're looking for," she says. "We can then build on what they envision."

Smallacombe and Daniel both note the importance of the caterer's experience, and Smallacombe points out it may be ideal to choose a caterer with specific experience at your party venue.

And remember to book a caterer at least six months in advance.

Primping for your special day

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

On the day of your big event, nothing makes you feel more like a princess than being pampered. Whether they are giving you a full-body massage or applying a full face of professional makeup, these estheticians are sure to make you feel even more beautiful than you already do.

For 27 years, Estee Levine (647-887-5257) has been beautifying brides and bat mitzvahs all over Toronto, as well as giving makeup lessons. She works with an efficient team that includes her daughter.

Levine likes to meet with the bride before the wedding day to try out various makeup techniques, so that the bride can decide what she look likes best. "It's so important to listen to the clients," she says.

In many cases, Levine will do the makeup for the engagement party as well as the wedding.

While many cosmeticians tend to go overboard with exaggerated evening looks, Levine prefers a natural enhancement of the bride's existing assets. Citing natural pinks, bronzes and browns as the most popular shades for bridal makeup, Levine always aims for a classic look.

Levine offers an affordable service, which includes application as well as touch-ups. Her prices start at $65 for three people. For $900, Levine will be at your beck and call the entire day of your event, ensuring that any last-minute problems are solved.

When pampering includes a brand-new hair colour, a manicure and pedicure, look no further than Farah's Salon And Esthetics (905-760-2424). The 20-year-old salon specializes in hair colouring and hair repair as well as all other esthetic services.

Farah's, which has a large and loyal client base, is always up on the latest hair trends as staff members attend seasonal hair shows and are constantly reading up on the newest, hottest styles.

Offering a wonderful bridal service, Farah's allows the bride to try various hairstyles she desires free of charge. On the wedding day, Farah's will open as early as necessary to make sure that the entire party is ready for the event. Farah's friendly and warm atmosphere will ensure ultimate relaxation as you celebrate one of the most special days of your life.

Preparing for the most memorable moments of your life are equally as memorable as the events themselves. If not every day, Farah's Salon And Esthetics and Estee Levine will give you the royal treatment for just one day.

Decor: from styrofoam sculptures to satin-covered seats

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Artist Caroline Keane operates Caroline Keane Design (905-726-8878) out of the Fred Varley Art Gallery in Unionville. She has had her company for eight years and is versatile both in the kind of commissions she takes and the media she works in.

Keane is an art therapist, but she has also done plenty of work for corporate events, including contracts for companies such as Famous Players. Her clients include community theatre, as well as retail store owners for whom she has done window design.

She also has bar and bat mitzvahs and other private celebrations on her resume, and she has done installations for all kinds of holidays, secular and religious, including Chanukah.

Keane works in all media and produces all kinds of objects. She does both backdrop and set design. She sandblasts, and works in wood, and works in glass, including etching. She loves vibrant colours, ranging from vivid party hues to subtle pastels, depending on the occasion.

Styrofoam can be sculpted, as Keane points out, noting that she has done a lot of work in this material. Hot wire gives a clean cut, while for bigger pieces, she needs saws, but this work is less fine.

Besides making things, Keane enjoys dealing with people. And as the owner-operator of a business, she has to be both her own salesperson and quality control manager. And while she has occasional help from some stay-at-home moms she knows, she does most of the work herself.

Keane is also a participant in Art with Heart, a fundraiser for Casey House, and she donates surplus foam to the Yonge Street Mission and the Fred Varley Gallery.

Mark Jamieson's company Chair Decor Etc. (905-731-9217, www.chairdecor.com) is a rental company specializing in a wide range of chair coverings. The company has been in business for 15 years, and is the largest company of its kind in Canada.

"We will fit any chair there is," asserts Jamieson.

Chair Decor offers a full linen service, and carries more than 120 table coverings in a variety of fabrics. It also carries some accessories as well, such as charger plates, napkin rings, and frames for table and place numbers.

Decor by Caroline Keane Design.

Jamieson and his team also carry Chiavari chairs, and they do decor work related to their linen specialty, such as backdrops and head table decor. In addition, they set up and take down. However, they don't do cutlery or centrepieces.

"We focus on our core competency, and concentrate on doing it right," Jamieson explains.

He notes that this philosophy is like that of the fine restaurant that, rather than overwhelm patrons with a huge menu, offers a modest selection but prepares and serves each dish to perfection.

Chair Decor does plenty of party work, as well as corporate events such as promotions and sales meetings. One coming single-day event involves 500 table covers, 5,000 chair covers and 5,000 napkins. This time of year, Jamieson and his team get fundraiser work too.

Chair Decor specializes in a range of chair coverings.

"Our business is a fashion business," he says. "Fabrics, colours and trims come and go, and I have to be something of a fashion consultant."

As parties grow more grand, Jamieson says that his work requires increased co-ordination with party planners and other professionals at events. Along with larger quantities of material, there are more variables in colours which work best with different venues, lighting, etc.

Other decor places advertising in this supplement are Artistic Creations, 519- 672-1855, and National Council of Jewish Women, 416-633-5100.

Ketubah Ketubah delivers online

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Planning a wedding and want the perfect blend of art and tradition in your ketubah, be it Orthodox, Conservative or Reform? Then a virtual visit to ketubah.com is in order.

For more than a decade Michael Shapiro, president of Ketubah Ketubah (www.ketubah.com or 416-963-9191) has brought couples marital joy via his thriving online business as a provider of artful Judaica.

In 1996, Shapiro decided to get off the corporate train and marry his two greatest interests together: Judaism and art.

A year spent studying and networking with artists in Israel made him realize that it was high time the North American Jewish community had an Internet ketubah store catering to its needs. The rest is history.

Initially run out of his Toronto home, Shapiro's business made early use of the concept of "virtual shopping" and became one of the first online ketubah specialty stores.

Word of mouth spread rapidly and the business grew to the point where Shapiro needed to relocate from his virtual space to a real office and gallery venue in downtown Toronto.

He has since hired a staff of six Judaica and ketubah artists, each fluent in spoken and written Hebrew, to better serve his clientele. "I'm always looking for talented [Judaica] artists, but more often than not now they come to me," he said. "Since we've opened we've sold thousands of ketubot internationally."

Always the innovator, Shapiro was proud to unveil the "ketubah personalization wizard" this past summer. The online program makes the process of gathering Hebrew names much easier for couples and rabbis.

Customers can make use of an immense Hebrew and Yiddish name-dictionary, search for Hebrew names phonetically and even use a pop-up Hebrew keyboard.

But Ketubah Ketubah is more than just ketubot.

A visit to the website also offers shoppers a wide array of gift selections on items such as mezuzot, Hamsas, cookbooks and even tambourines.

Recognizing that clients wanted ever more options, Ketubah Ketubah began offering future wedding couples an online wedding gift registry for those who "never want to use a scanning gun again." The registry consists of beautiful items for the home, including plates, glasses, candleholders and picture frames.

The difference is that Shapiro's handpicked artisans design them all.

Though ketubot remain the highest-selling items in his line, the unique Gary Rosenthal collection of broken-glass art is rapidly becoming a favourite among clients.

"You can break a coloured glass at your wedding and then insert the shards into a mezuzah or Shabbat candlesticks or a menorah, [which] are pretty popular around Chanukah time," said Shapiro.

Another item shoppers should check out is called the "parents' gift." Designed by Ketubah Ketubah artisans, it is a framed piece of art given by grooms or brides to their parents. "It acknowledges the parents for having brought them to this point where they're ready to embark on married life," said Shapiro.

Because Ketubah Ketubah is primarily a virtual store, its clientele is usually faceless. But Torontonians are at an advantage as the Ketubah Ketubah gallery is located in downtown Toronto.

"Most of our customers never meet us," said Shapiro. "But people in Toronto have the option of calling us, making an appointment and looking at samples."

While rush orders can be accommodated, Shapiro advises brides and grooms-to-be to contact Ketubah Ketubah two to three months in advance of a wedding to give them the most options and selection.

Good videography is about teamwork, providers say

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

A photo captures a memory and makes it stand still, but a video captures a memory in motion.

The choice of a videographer to record your special event for posterity, is as important as choosing a photographer.

Darren Sager of DMS Video Productions (905-470-4040, www.dmsvideo. com), and Brian Korson, president of Video Excellence (905-731-4355, www. videoexcellence.com) are both competent, experienced professionals with different but complementary takes on what to look for when choosing a videographer.

In Sager's 20 years of experience as a videographer, he has stayed at the cutting edge of technology. "But there's owning equipment, and then there's understanding it," he points out. "Better knowledge means a better product."

Looking beyond equipment and technical know-how, Sager considers videography to be an art form. He likes coming up with new ideas, and he sees his company as a team of young, energetic and creative talents.

Also, Sager treats good videography as teamwork.

"This is a principle that goes beyond videography," he elaborates. "Quality cars, architecture, orchestral music: they're all collaborative efforts."

Besides coming up with creative ideas, a team simplifies the logistics.

"With a team, there's always someone to work at your event," Sager says. "There's no risk of a no-show, as with a one-person operation."

Sager adds that he doesn't sub-contract: he only uses people who are part of the company, whom he can trust.

Pictured, from left, are Jason, Darren, Karey and Kirby, part of the team at DMS Video Productions.

Sager's videographers are also editors. At every event, he has a crew of two, a cameraman and an assistant.

His people use high-definition, wide-screen broadcast-news-style cameras, and technical features such as lenses are always of the best professional quality.

A big CNN-style camera, Sager points out, is actually easier to hold steady than smaller ones, once you learn to balance it on your shoulder, and he makes sure his people are trained in this.

These cameras also need less light, Sager continues.

A tiny 10-watt bulb will do, and sometimes even ambient light is good enough. And you don't have to be close with such an apparatus: a long zoom shot is easy.

Korson, as president of a full-service video company, also knows the value of top-level talent, organization and equipment. In advising you how to choose a videographer, though, he places customer service above all.

"This means showing you concretely how your video will look," he says.

It also means advising on the drawbacks as well as benefits of certain techniques, Korson continues – citing the example of reduced lighting, which often imparts a feeling of intimacy, but makes colours less sharp.

While the client is sovereign, it's a videographer's duty to inform you of such things, he adds.

These days, with everything being done digitally, says Korson, videographers don't compete much in hardware and software.

"It boils down to customer service," he emphasizes.

Korson says the work of making a video occurs 50 per cent on the day of an event, and 50 per cent afterward in editing.

"Months later, when clients remember an event, it's what they see in the video that they recall," he adds.

Korson sends two videographers to every event. "This not only provides backup, but also means that everything is seen through two pairs of eyes, from two perspectives," he explains.

And, he assures you, his people are courteous, unobtrusive and always dressed to fit the occasion.

For an event in peak season, Korson advises booking six months to a year ahead, and three to six months ahead for events in the off season.

Sweets for my sweet, sugar for my honey

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Sharon Firestone and Shelly Schwartz have a lot in common. The former caters bar and bat mitzvah's and weddings, while the latter brings in pounds of candy for dessert. Besides providing good eats for party guests, the two are undergoing some major changes in their businesses.

For 51 years, Firestone's Sweet York Desserts (416-783-4293) has been operating out of the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, but her tenure there is coming to an end. Now, she'll set up a kosher kitchen at the Adath Israel. "We're looking forward to a new relationship at a very busy synagogue," says Firestone, who also operates out of the Beth Tikvah.

Schwartz, meanwhile, has been transitioning from motherhood into her new operation, A Candy Affair (905-731-5667). Along with her husband, the mother of five creates personalized candy tables decorated with lights, the bar mitzvah kid's name, and a lot of candy. "Jawbreakers, gum, sour candy, colourful twisted lollipops," says Schwartz.

It's apparent that both Schwartz and Firestone are looking forward to their new endeavours, and you should be, too. Firestone's always been committed to quality and tasty foods, and changing digs isn't going to alter her goals.

In fact, the move has rejuvenated the caterer. "We're in the midst of getting an offsite bakery, that's going to be retail," she said excitedly. "And then, at some point in time, we want to turn the store in a retail high-end kosher store. Firestone Fine Foods."

She admits that baking in the same location for so many years might have forced her into a rut, but now with the big move, the company can reinvent itself. "It's an opportunity to go into different venues and situations," says Firestone. "We'll be catering a lot of offsite venues as well. We're redoing our website, and coming up with new menus."

But a new menu doesn't mean she won't give the people what they want. Chocolate fountains, a waffle or cupcake station, and decorating cookies are some of the desserts her clients have been requesting lately, as well as "a dessert to go with the season like fresh berries in the spring and summer," she says.

For Schwartz, dessert is her specialty. Although she's just getting her business off the ground – she's only done one bar mitzvah so far – her "unique selection of kosher candy" is starting to raise eyebrows across the city.

The idea for making candy tables came to her when she was deciding what to make her nephew for his bar mitzvah. She wanted to do something unconventional and "unforgettable," and soon decided on creating a candy display. Finding the treats were easy – she had plenty of connections from her previous business, Gourmet Temptations and Personally Yours parties, and designing the tables was even easier – her husband owns the Shelving Outlet. This gift to her nephew was so successful that other parents at the party wanted candy tables for their own functions.
